THE author of the following fheets hath endeavoured, to the utmost of his abilities, to give the Public a fuccinct and impartial History of the prefent war.—No flave to faction, no dupe to prejudice; he hath represented facts as they really happened. It is the business of history to record; not to flatter. The condour of the public is requested for a work, the design of which is certainly commendable : How it is executed the reader must determine.

O enquire into the origin of the war, it will be neceffary to look back almost to the peace of Aix la Chapelle, in the year 1748; for we fhall find, that very foon after that treaty, the french laid the foundations for a future war. In order to perceive this more clearly, I fhall take a particular view of the proceedings of France in North America (the country in which the late commotions first began) from the abovementioned time.

In the year 1749, fome english american traders commenced a traffic with the indians, on the banks of the river Ohio. The french knowing the importance of that country, were defirous to prevent us from trading, or having any communication with those indians; they threatned them with the confifcation of their goods, and imprifonment of their perfons, if they did not retire, from what, they were pleafed to call, their mafter's territories. Many of the traders immediately withdrew, on receiving this infolent menace; but feveral others, knowing their own just right, had more fpirit; and continued their traffic as usual, notwithstanding the threats denounced against them : and accordingly in 1750, the marquis de la Jonquiere, at that time governor of Canada, fent feveral detachments of troops to the Ohio, to put their former threats in execution; which they did by feizing four english traders, and confiscating their goods, fending them prifoners to Quebec, from whence they were brought to Rochelle in France, and there detained in prison. These englishmen soon after their arrival at Rochelle, wrote to the earl of Albemarle, our ambaffador at Paris, complaining of the ill ufage they had received : upon which, that minister wrote a letter to the earl of Holdernesse, secretary of state to the king of England; of which the following is an extract.

"Paris, march 1, 1752. I muft acquaint your lordfhip, that in the month of november I received a letter from three perfons, figning themfelves, John Patton, Luke Irwin, and Thomas Bourke; reprefenting to me, that they were englifhmen, who had been brought to Rochelle, and put into prifon there, from whence they wrote; having been taken by the french fubjects, who feized their effects, as they were trading with the englifh, and other indians on the Ohio, and carried prifoners to Quebec; from whence they have been fent over to Rochelle, Rochelle, where they were hardly ufed. Upon this information, I applied to M. St. Conteft, and gave him a note of it; claiming them, as the king's fubjects, and demanding their liberty, and the reftitution of their effects that had been unjuftly taken from them.

These three perfons, I find by the paper your lordship has sent me, are of the number of those demand. ed of the french by Mr. Clinton, and named in M. de la Jonquiere's letter. I have wrote to a merchant at Rochelle to enquire after them, and to fupply them with money, to make their journey hither, if they are not gone; that I may receive from them all the informations neceffary. On my feeing M. St. Conteft next tuefday, I will reprefent the cafe to him, in obedience to his majesty's commands, that la Jonquiere may have politive orders, to defift from the unjuftifiable proceedings complained of; to releafe any of his majefty's fubjects he may still detain in prifon; and make ample reftitution of their effects. And I fhall take care to fhow him the abfolute neceffity of fending inftructions to their feveral governors, not to attempt any fuch encroachments for the future."

And on the 8th of march lord Albemarle further writes to the earl of Holderneffe.

" I am now to acquaint your lordfhip, that I faw M. Rouille yefterday; and that having drawn up a note of the feveral complaints I had received orders to make of la Jonquiere's conduct, I delivered it to him, and told him, in general, the contents of it; infifting on the neceffity, for preferving the good underftanding betwixt his majefty and the moft chriftian king, of fending fuch politive orders to all their governors, as might effectually prevent, for the future, any fuch encroachments on his majefty's territories, and committing fuch violence on his fubjects, as had been done in the paft.

B₂

I added

I added to my remonftrance, that I hoped they would be taken into confideration quickly; that he might be able to give me an anfwer next week, or as foon afterwards as he poffibly could. This minifter told me, he would use his best endeavours for that purpose; affured me it was the intention of his court to prevent any disputes arising, that might tend to alter the prefent correspondence between the two nations; and that I might depend upon such orders being sent to their governors accordingly.

Of the three men I mentioned to your lordfhip in my letter of laft week, that had been brought prifoners from Canada to Rochelle, whom I fent for to come to Paris, two of them are arrived, and the third is gone to London. I will take fuch informations from them, as may be neceffary for my own inftruction, to fupport their receiving fatisfaction for the injuries that have been done them.".

At the fame time that my lord Albemarle mentioned the above affair to M. de Rouille, he delivered to him a memorial containing his complaints, of which the following is a part.

"As to the fort which the french have undertaken to build on the river Niagara, and as to the fix englifhmen who have been made prifoners; lord Albemarle is ordered by his court to demand, that the moft exprefs orders be fent to M. de la Jonquiere, to defift from fuch unjust proceedings, and in particular, to caufe the fort above-mentioned, to be immediately razed; and the french and others in their alliance, who may happen to be there, to retire forthwith : as likewife, to fet the fix englifhmen at liberty, and to make them ample fatisfaction for the wrongs and loffes they have fuffered; and laftly, that the perfons who have committed thefe exceffes, be punifhed in fuch a manner as may ferve for an example to thofe who might venture on any like attempt." It is neceffary here to add a remark or two on this perplexed and intricate affair; concerning which, fo much falfhood has been propagated. It is very plain that, although feveral just demands were made by lord Albemarle to the french minister, yet none of them (except the releafing the three men at Rochelle) were complied with : even to this day the fort at Niagara has not been demolished. No fatisfaction was made to those englishmen who were taken prisoners, for the loffes they fuftained; nor any reflitution made for the effects that had been feized. And as to the pofitive orders which were to be fent to all their governors in North America, and to de la Jonquiere in particular, for them to defift-from any the like attempts or encroachments for the future, every one knows the french never thought of complying with this demand, fince they continued without interruption their encroachments; and were fo far from defifting from the fame, that they even carried them every day further and further, till at laft it came to an open war between the two nations.

It is one of the first and best of political maxims, for every nation to refent the wrongs done them vi-goroufly and without delay. But, to the misfortune of their country, the ministry in England did not follow that method to have its injuries redreffed. Tis true, my lord Albemarle demanded every thing that it was reafonable to expect the french could grant. But there certainly is a wide difference between demanding, and having those demands granted. The only article complied with was, the releasing the three englishmen at Rochelle. Now it is natural here to enquire into the profession it is natural here to enquire into the reason, why the british ministry did not infift upon having the other articles, mentioned in the lord Albemarle's memorial, complied with inftantly, and a ftop put to the many encroachments which the french were making in America. We know this fhould have been done: and we know it was not done. To enquire -inte into the fecret fprings and caufes of this neglect, muft be left to those who are more acquainted with the affairs of state: but thus much I may venture to fay, that one of the principal ones was the dread and fear which the ministry in England had, of being drawn into a war with France; the reasons for this fear, I think, are very evident.

The marquis de la Jonquiere, governor of Cana-da, died in march, 1752, just as he was preparing to march a confiderable body of troops to the Ohio, with defign to continue their encroachments on that river. The marquis du Quesne, successor to Jonquiere, no fooner arrived at Quebec, in the middle of the year, than he haftened to continue what his predeceffor had begun; and gave the command of the troops designed for the Ohio, to the sieur de St. Pierre, who began his march in the latter end of 1753, and wintered in a fort which he built on the Beef River. In the month of october, during his ftay at this post, he received a letter from Mr. Dinwiddie, lieutenant governor of Virginia, dated the 31ft, com-plaining of fundry late hoftilities; and defiring to know, by what authority an armed force had marched from Canada, and invaded a territory indubitably the right of his britannic majefty. Major Wafhing-ton was the bearer of this letter. He returned with the following answer from Monf. Legardeur de St. Pierre, dated at the fort on Beef River, the 15th of december, 1753.

" SIR,

As I have the honor to command here in chief, Mr. Washington delivered me the letter, which you directed to the commandant of the french troops. I should have been pleased if you had given him orders, or if he himself had been disposed, to visit Canada and our general; to whom, rather than to me, it properly appertains, to remonstrate the reality of the king my master's rights to lands situated along the the Ohio, and to difpute the pretenfions of the king of Great-Britain in that respect.

I shall immediately forward your letter to Monf. le marquis du Quesne. His answer will be a law to me: and if he directs me to communicate it to you, I affure you, fir, I shall neglect nothing that may be neceffary to convey it to you with expedition.

As to the requisition you make (that I retire with the troops under my command) I cannot believe myfelf under any obligation to fubmit to it : I am here in virtue of my general's orders; and I beg, fir, you would not doubt a moment of my fixed refolution to conform to them, with all the exactitude and fteadinefs that might be expected from a better officer.

I do not know that, in the course of this campaign, any thing has paffed that can be effeemed an act of hostility, or contrary to the treaties fubfifting between the two crowns; the continuation of which is as interesting and pleasing to us, as it can be to the english. If it had been agreeable to you, fir, in this refpect, to have made a particular detail of the facts which occafion your complaint, I fhould have had the honor of anfwering you in the moft explicit manner; and, I am perfuaded you would have had reafon to be fatisfied.

I have taken particular care to receive Mr. Wafhington with all the diffinction fuitable to your dig-nity, and to his quality and great merit. I flatter myfelf that he will do me this justice, and join with with me in teftifying the profound respect with which

I am, Sir,

Your most humble

And most obedient servant,

LEGARDEUR DE ST. PIERRE."

On receipt of this refolute answer, Mr. Dinwiddie made instant complaint to the court of Great-Britain; and laboured what he could to rouze the Virginians into into a vigorous opposition. He wrote also to the neighbouring governors, importuning the aid of the other colonies, for repelling the invalion, and erecting a fort at the confluence of the Ohio and Monan-gahela. An immediate junction in fuch measures became abfolutely requifite for the common fecurity. But the colonies, inattentive to the inconveniencies of an endless frontier, contemned the power of Canada, and confided in the number of their inhabitants. They were fo entirely ignorant of the fituation and importance of the inland country; that when application was made to Virginia for fuccours, conformable to directions from the ministry in England, some of our provincial assemblies, particularly those of Penfilvania and New York *, feemed even to question his majefty's right to the lands usurped by the french. Others, to avoid their share in the burden, framed the most triffing excuses. New York, however, voted 50001. currency in aid of Virginia ; which, confidering her own fituation, and approaching diftreffes, was no ungenerous contribution.

But the Virginians proceeded in their refolution of marching a body of troops to the protection of their frontiers: and paffed an act in February, 1754, for the raifing 10,000 l. and 300 men. The command was given to col. Washington, a young gentleman of great bravery and distinguished merit. He

You would not admit, that 'the french encroachments and fortifications on the Ohio were within our limits, or his majetly's dominions, then by feeking an excuse to avoid doing what was required of you.

Extract of the addrefs of the general affembly of New York to lieutenant governor de Lancy, 23 April, 1754.

It appears, by other papers, your honor has been pleafed to communicate to us, that the french have built a fort at a place called the French Creek, at a confiderable diffance from the river Ohio, which may, but does not by any evidence or information appear to us to be an invalion of any of his majefty's colonies.

He began his march at the head of his little army, about the 1st of may. On the 28th he had a skirmish with the enemy, of whom ten were flain, and about twenty were made prifoners. But col. Washington finding himfelf too weak, waited for further reinforcements; during which time he was alarmed with the news, that a great body of french and in-dians were marching against him. It feems the marquis du Quesne, governor general of Canada, had appointed the fieur de Contre-Cœur to command the french troops on the Ohio, who being acquainted with the fkirmifh which col. Washington had with a party of french, refolved to fend the greatest part of his forces, under the fieur de Villiers, to diflodge col. Washington from his little camp, which he had formed, and which was called fort Necessity. In obedience to thefe inftructions, Villiers accordingly marched at the head of near 1000 french and 200 indians against the english. On the 3d of july, he came in fight of fort Necessity. The english troops not amounting to above 200 men, were a handful compared to the number of the enemy; but they fought bravely for upwards of three hours, nor did they give over before they had flain near 200 of the enemy; but col. Washington, observing their great superiority, who began to hem him in on all quarters, found himself under the absolute necessity of fubmitting to the difagreeable terms, that were offered him.

In this action we had 30 killed and 50 wounded. The french, as I have faid before, were affifted by a confiderable number of indians, who had been long in the english alliance. And many of them were known to be of the fix nations. On the furrender of our camp, they fell at once to pillaging the baggage and provisions; and shot several of the hories and cattle.

Against this conduct col. Washington remonstrated; but all his arguments made little impression upon them.

them. Thus the french remained mafters of the field ; the indians were rivetted in their defection ; and the frontiers of the colony exposed, through the ill-timed parfimony of the provinces. The enemy on the other hand wifely improved the prefent advantage, and erected forts to fecure to themselves the quiet poffeffion of that fertile country. To fhew the ne-gligence of the province of Penfilvania, we need only take notice, that foon after Washington's defeat, a thousand of the back inhabitants prefented a petition to the affembly, praying, that they might be furnished with arms and ammunition for their defence; but the petition was rejected with fcorn. Our indian allies have often defired us to build forts, to which their wives and children might fly in time of danger; and fent down to the governor of Penfilvania, begging he would direct the building a ftockade, or wooden fort, in which they offered to defend themfelves and the english from the incursions of the enemy; but the affembly, to be confiftent with themfelves, and to fhow that they were religiously bent on the ruin of their country, refused to give any money to this pur-pofe, and gave the indians for answer, that if they were afraid of the enemy, they might retire further down, and come within the fettled parts of the province. Thus the nobleft opportunity was loft that could have been offered, of keeping our indians steady, and for building a fort at a small expence, in a pass to commodioully fituated between the mountains, that it would have effectually covered and defended two of our frontier counties, from the inroads of the french and their indians.

I shall here take notice of an instruction sent from his majesty to the several governors of North America; whereby the earl of Holdernesse fignified his majesty's commands, that in case the subjects of any foreign prince should presume to make any encroachments in the limits of his majesty's dominions, or to erect forts on his majesty's lands, or to commit any other other act of hoftility; and fhould upon a requisition made to them to defift from fuch proceedings, perfift in them, they should draw forth the armed force of their respective provinces, and use their best endeavours to repel force by force.

It was in confequence of this meffage, that the governor of Penfilvania in particular, urged the affembly of that province, to raife the neceffary fums for their own defence, with fo much warmth, but which, as I have before faid, they refufed to do; although at that time the province was in the utmost danger.

At the beginning of a war, every transaction and affair, which at another time would be reckoned immaterial, is of great importance to be known. It is for this reason that I have, and shall continue to be, very particular in giving diftinct accounts of all our american affairs; as this war, contrary to all others, has been more critical and important there, than any where elfe. I shall now mention the affairs of Nova Scotia, in which province we find the french committed repeated hostilities; and with their ufual impudence feized all that part of Nova Scotia, beyond the bay of Fundi, from the river Chignecto, to that of St. John, making the first the limits of that province. Mr. Cornwallis was at that time governor of it; and M. de la Jonquiere commanded in chief in Canada, who openly and readily avowed the unjust proceedings of the french. But this affair will be much clearer laid open by the following memorial, which contains a recapitulation of the conduct of France in that province; flating many interesting particulars in a just and clear light. It was delivered to the marquis de Puysieulx at Paris, by the earl of Albemarle, the 7th of june, 1750.

"The underwritten ambaffador extraordinary and plenipotentiary, from his majefty, the king of Great-Britain, has orders from the king his mafter, dated Hanover, the 26th of last month, to represent to the court court of France, how much he is furprized at hearing the violent proceedings of the french in America, under the authority and direction of M. de la Jonquiere, who has readily avowed them.

M. Cornwallis, governor of Nova Scotia, informs the duke of Bedford, by a letter dated the first of may this year, that the french have taken possession of all that part of Nova Scotia, beyond the bay of Fundi, from the river Chignesto to that of St. John, making the first the limits of that province.

They have reduced Beaubaffin to afhes, and carried to the other fide of the river the inhabitants with their effects; compelled them to take up arms, and formed them into companies; fo that the fieur Lacorne, a french officer has at that place under his command, a body of 2500 men, made up of regular troops, canadians and indians.

The fieur de Lacorne and father Loutre, a french miffionary, have made use of repeated and innumerable promises and menaces, in order to perfuade all the inhabitants of the province to leave the country.

The inhabitants declare openly their abhorrence of thefe proceedings; but the fieurs de Lacorne and Loutre, threaten them with a general maffacre from the indians, if they remain in the province. They fupport and protect openly the indians, our declared enemies; who inlift under the banners of France. They detain the king's fubjects, his officers and foldiers, prifoners. They excite the king's french fubjects to a rebellion; and thofe who remain loyal, they threaten with deftruction. They fend their indian flaves all over the country, where they are guilty of all forts of outrages.

They have fet fire to the towns acknowledged by themfelves, to appertain to his majefty.

Governor Cornwallis fent the fieur Lawrence, major of foot, with a detachment to Chignecto; where he arrived the 20th of last april. They faw the french french fet fire to the town of Chignecto, french colours planted on the ditches; and the fieur de la Corne at the head of his detachment, braving major Lawrence; and declaring, that he would defend to the laft, that ground as belonging to France.

The fieur de la Corne having fent to defire a conference with the fieur Lawrence, the latter, accompanied by two captains of foot, went to meet him, and demanded by whofe orders he had thus come into his majefty's territories, and committed fuch acts of violence. The fieur de la Corne anfwered; it was by thofe of M. de la Jonquiere, who had alfo com-'manded him to take pofieffion of Chippodi, John's River, Man-rem, Cooke, Pitcordiack, and of all that country, as far as the river, which was on the the right hand of major St. Lawrence, as belonging to his most christian majefty; or at least, that he was to keep and defend it as such, till such time as the limits were fettled by commission appointed for that purpose.

Though the fieur Lawrence had under his command a detachment of regular troops, very little inferior to that commanded by the fieur Lacorne, he forbore committing any hostilities, in obedience to the king's orders for that purpofe.

The king cannot perfuade himfelf that thefe acts of violence have been committed with the knowledge of the court of France, and he is fo fully convinced of his moft chriftian majefty's equity, and his defire to maintain a good underftanding between the two crowns, that he affures himfelf the moft chriftian king will readily flow his difapprobation of fuch conduct.

Governor Cornwallis has never made, nor defigned to make any fettlements out of the limits of the peninfula, which the french before never pretended to belong to them : The king having had no intention, in forming a fettlement in his province of Nova Scotia, to encroach on the rights of his most christian majesty, jefty, or to take forcible poffeffion of a country, of which the king had referred the right of propriety to the decifion of the commiffaries appointed for that purpofe; before it was poffible for them to have met in order to proceed to the fettling of the limits. The under written ambaffador has orders to de-

The under written ambaffador has orders to demand, that the conduct of M. de la Jonquiere be difavowed : that pofitive orders be fent him immediately to withdraw his troops, and the indians under his authority from the places which belong to Great-Britain ; that amends be made for the acts of violence which have been committed, and the damage which the king's fubjects have fuffered : and his majefty is perfuaded that the court of France will make no difficulty, to give the underwritten ambaffador the duplicate of the orders, which will be fent to the governor of Canada, that he may tranfmit them to his court. Done at Compeigne the 7th of july, 1750. Signed,

ALBEMARLE.

In anfwer to this memorial, the marquis de Puyficulx wrote the following letter to the earl of Albemarle, dated Compeigne, july 23, 1750.

" SIR,

In the memorial, which your excellency has given me concerning the complaints of M. Cornwallis, governor of Arcadia, are contained many facts, fo contrary to the equity of his majefty, the inftructions of M. de la Jonquiere, and that if they are found to be fuch as they are reprefented, the king will take care juffice shall be done to his britannic majefty's subjects, and will give such fresh orders, as will prevent the rife of any dispute of what kind sover between the two nations; his majefty being thoroughly persuaded his britannic majefty will give, on his side, orders to the some purpose. Give me leave, fir, to tell you I cannot be prevailed upon to believe, but that the facts are exposed with too much exaggeration, and from my knowledge of M. de la Jonquiere's prudence, and the inftructions which he has, I am forry M. Cornwallis has not applied for redrefs, before he had made complaints to his court. I fent your memorial, as foon as I received it to M. Rouille, and defired he would take the proper steps, to be informed in a speedy and precise manner, of what has passed at Canada, so as I may be enabled to give your excellency a more positive answer. I have the honour to be, &c.

Signed, PUYSIEULX. P. S. Might not M. Cornwallis have attempted to form fettlements on the places that are in difpute, or even on the king's territories ?"

Soon after the earl of Albemarle received this letter, the french ministry gave him a copy of a letter wrote from M. Rouille, to M. de la Jonquiere; in which he was directed to forbear committing hostilities on the fubjects of England.

But Mr. Cornwallis had not force enough to drive them from their encroachments; and it was very plain that they would remain in them, in fpite of all the remonstrances and memorials, that the english ambaffador might make at Paris; for we find the french made no motions with defign to quit the country they had feized; till they were drove out by the New England troops in 1755; of which more hereafter. But before I take my leave of the affairs of this province for the prefent, it is neceffary to take notice of a memorial delivered at Paris to my lord Albemarle, (as a further answer to the complaints of England) the 15th of feptember this year, in which they deny most of the facts laid to their charge; and speaking of the limits of the province in the most evafive and quibbling manner.

To

To return : I left col. Washington, just defeated, returning home (after having been obliged to submit to the disagreeable terms imposed on him) and he arrived fase at Williamsburg, after a most tedious and hazardous march.

As yet the affairs of North America had gone on but very badly, and wore a difmal countenance. The french were every where advancing, and always with fuccefs; our frontiers were all open to the enemy, and nothing to defend them ; in fuch a calamitous condition, fomething must be done, but what to determine on, was difficult to know: our colonies were, fingly, fo weak, that a junction was at that time absolutely neceffary, and accordingly refolved on. By his majesty's orders, the 14th of june was appointed for a grand congress of commiffaries from the feveral provinces to be held at Albany, as well to treat with the indians of the fix nations, as to concert a scheme for a general union of the british colonies. Meffengers had been dispatched to the indian chiefs to request their attendance; but they did not arrive till the latter end of the month; and the Mohawks, who lived but 40 miles diftant, came in last. This occafioned various speculations; fome imputed it to fear, least the french in their absence, should fall upon their countries. But the most probable reafon of it was : that the indians imagined, that by exciting our jealoufy of their wavering disposition, at so critical a juncture, the more liberal would be the prefents made them by the feveral governments. But they arrived at last, though in smaller numbers than was expected, or had been ufual on those occasions : though they had been very well pleafed with the prefents made them, which were much more confiderable than had been ever known : in their fpeech to Mr. de Lancey, the lieutenant governor of New York, they fpoke with great vehemence, and very feverely upon our negligent and indolent behaviour; extolling the better conduct of the french in fortifying ing and maintaining their garrifons. And recriminated upon us the defertion of our fort at Saraghtoga the laft war; lamented the defencelefs condition, of our frontier city of Albany; and earneftly exhorted us for the future to defend ourfelves with more fpirit. The indians being difmiffed, the conferences were continued till the 11th of july: the commiffioners being, both for abilities and fortune, fome of the moft confiderable men in North America : in the conclufion of their debates, a plan was concerted for a general union of the britifh colonies, and creating a common fund to defray all military expences; and a reprefentation of their prefent flate drawn up; which was agreed to be laid before the king's minifters. But this fcheme was never put in execution.

During the fitting of the congress at Albany, Mr. Shirley, governor of Massachuset's Bay; a gentleman, of whom I shall have much to fay in the fequel; propofed to the affembly of that province the building a strong fort near the head of the river Kennebeck, in order to protect the province from the incursions of the french, and the indians; which the affembly agreed to; and provided pay and fubfistence for 800 men, to be raifed on that account. Accordingly in the fummer, Mr. Shirley proceeded to the eaftern parts of the province, with the troops raifed for that purpole; and with the confent of the indians, built fort Western and fort Halifax upon the river Kenebeck, the former about 37 miles from the mouth of it; and the other, about 54. Of this fervice, Mr. Shirley transmitted an account to England, and at the fame time reprefented the imminent danger, which he apprehended the neigh-bouring province of Nova-Scotia was expoled to from the fortifications, and other encroachments of the french upon the iftmus, and the peninfula there, and St. John's river in the bay of Fundi; as alfo, from the fudden attacks, which might be formed against it from St. John's island, Louisburg and Quebec. In anfwer answer to which Mr. Shirley received a letter from fir Thomas Robinson, one of his majesty's principal fecretaries of state, containing his majesty's approbation of the fervice upon the river Kennebeck, with orders to communicate it to the affembly. And foon after Mr. Shirley received his majefty's commands, to concert measures, with Mr. Lawrence, lieutenant governor, and commander in chief of the province of Nova Scotia, for attacking the french forts in that province. Accordingly, by his majefty's commands, Mr. Shirley raifed 2000 new england men, and received 2000 stands of small arms from England; with which force he marched, in conjunction with Mr. Lawrence (with the troops under his command which were in Nova Scotia) attacked, and reduced the french forts at Beausejour, and at Gaspereau, near Bay Verte, making the garrifons prifoners : and in a fhort time after, upon two of his majesty's ships of war appear-ing before the french fort, situated on the river of St. John's, about three miles above the mouth of it, the garrifon there burft their cannon, demolished their works as much as they could, evacuated the fort, and retired up the river, to their other fettlements upon it. By reason of the time that was necessary to prepare for this expedition, the fervice was not executed till the 19th of june, 1755. The remainder of the year 1754 was spent prin-

The remainder of the year 1754 was fpent principally in repeated reprefentations to the miniftry in England, laying before them the bad ftate of the colonies; together with feveral fchemes for their general union; affuring them, that if fpeedy and powerful affiftance was not adminiftered, the colonies in America would inevitably fall a prey to the ambitious defigns of the court of France.

In this manner ended the year 1754. As yet both courts continued to give the most folemn affurances of maintaining the peace between the two nations inviolably; when at the fame time an open and bloody war was carrying on between them in America. It was was very palpable, that the pretended peace (which in fact had not a being) would not laft long, but that the war would foon fpread into Europe. In Ame-rica there happened no affair of great confequence; but, as in the beginning of a war every thing is of fome confequence, becaufe it is at the breaking out of one, I have been obliged to purfue the thread of affairs in America step by step, and to give the most particular accounts of, even some matters which at first fight the reader will imagine but of little moment, which he will find by the fequel, were of importance enough to have a place in hiftory, as they tend very much to the clearer understanding of what follows. This was the first war, in which Great Britain may be faid to have engaged purely for the defence of her american colonies; they certainly well deferve all the expence, pains, and care that their mother country can take of them. Since the will; in the end, be repaid with an hundred fold for whatever fhe can expend in their defence. Although Great Britain finds, that its very being as a nation, depends upon her colonies, still we fee (or at least we have good reafon to think fo) that the french know the value of them much better than us. They make (comparatively fpeaking) more of Canada, which is a mere barren rock, in comparison with our colonies, than we do of all our noble fettlements in North America. Nor can we here confider their fituation at the close of the year 1754, without being aftonished at the negligent remiffiels of the english ministry, to fuffer these valuable territories, which make fo confiderable a part of his majefty's dominions, to remain in fo open and defenceless a condition. They may fay in justification of themselves, that the colonies have ftrength enough to defend themfelves : but then they ought to remember, that, it is not in their power to make use of the strength they have, fince every one knows, that while they all continue in feperate provinces, without any connection with one another, they

they may eafily fall a prey to the combined and more formidable flrength of the french and their indians. Is it not furprifing, that, while the french were advancing on all fides, after they had defeated the troops under Wafhington; and feized all that valuable tract of country, fituated on the Ohio and its branches; and were continually receiving reinforcements from old France; after all this, it is not, I fay, a mark of the utmoft negligence, treachery or flupidity in the e____h m___y, never yet to fend any troops or forces to America, to defend his majefty's rights againft the unjuft ufurpations and invafions of the french?

We find that the french began the new year in America, with their ufual diligence and activity; and having the advantage of great reinforcements from old France early in the year *; bid very fair for

* Extract of a letter, dated Philadelphia, jan. 2, 1755.

« SIR,

Since my laft, we have five days ago received certain intelligence, that a body of nigh 6000 men, of the beft troops of France, felected and fent over upon this particular fervice, are juft arrived at the lower fort on the Ohio, and are employed, even in this rigorous feafon, in fortifying that country. In feptember laft, the french men of war that brought them over, were feen not far from the entrance into the river St. Lawrence, into which, we are now certain they all went, and landed at Quebec. After a fhort flay in that city, they were feen by our indian traders paffing the lakes Ofwego and Erie, in a prodigious number of battoes, of which the feveral governors received notice, though we did not then conjecture that it was an armament from old France; till now that we are too certain of it.

Notwithftanding this, our affembly continues as obflinate as ever ; nor have we as yet any probability of their giving any money for our defence, although we hear they are to adjourn in two days. The governor has befeeched them to confider the defencelefs flate of the province, and eftablifh a regular militia, but in vaim. He alfo obferves, that the activity of the french at this rigorous feafon cannot but convince the world, that they have formed fome grand defign with regard to this continent, and that they have made their first for pufhing our colonies much further, efpecially as they had not a fingle regiment from Europe to defend them; and their enemies were continually receiving fupplies; which together with their advantageous fituation for a war, having little or no frontier to defend, made them much more than a match for the englifh colonies, who have fuch an immenfe one, without any thing to defend it with. Thus we find the french advanced with fuch hafty ftrides, that at the beginning of this year, their camp and forts upon the Ohio, and the parts adjacent, were not more than 225 miles, horizontal diftance, from the city of Philadelphia, and only about two days march from fome of our back fettlements.

At laft we find that a general was appointed to command in America; his majefty conftituted general Braddock generalifimo of all the troops which were in, or fhould be fent to America; and accordingly this general arrived in Virginia in february; and as foon, as he poffibly could, fent express to the feveral governors to meet him, in order to have a confultation on the business of the approaching campaign. This convention, by appointment of the general, was held at Alexandria in Virginia. After much debating it was agreed, that for the prefervation of Ofwego, and reduction of Niagara, Shirley's and Pepperel's regiments should proceed to lake Ontario; on which lake, one or more armed vessels of about 60 ton each should be built, to command it. This part of the fervice was committed to Mr. Shirley's care; while general Braddock attacked first attack upon Penfilvania, as being in the center, and being not only the most plentiful, but the most defenceles and unwieldy of all his majesty's colonies. Having once got footing here, they will iffue forth upon the other colonies on either fide; and as they have fuch a large body already in the field, we apprehend it is their defign, early in the fpring, to fortify the passes in the mountains; and if they accomplish this, and can find provisions, they will be able to stand against three times their numbers."

fort du Quesne; and the provincial troops, commanded by general Johnson, marched to invest Crown Point.

Purfuant to thefe refolutions, general Braddock, at the head of 2200 men, began his march against fort du Quefne, and arrived at fort Cumberland in his way thither, the 10th of may; from thence to fort du Quefne is not lefs than 140 miles: Mr. Braddock began his march from the former on the 10th of june; leaving the garrifon under the command of col. Innes. From the time the general marched from fort Cumberland, we may begin to date the mifcarriage of the expedition, which proceeded from a thousand different reasons, which it is now my business to show.

Innumerable were the difficulties he had to furmount, in a country rugged, pathlefs, and unknown, a-crofs the allegheney mountains, through unfrequented woods, and dangerous defiles ; but thefe dangers were doubly encreafed, by the difappointments which the general met with in almost every thing he had to do with the provinces. We find he complains very much of this in his letters to the ministry in England, efpecially in one, wherein he particularizes all that had been promifed him; amongft which was the quarter-master-general, who affured him that he might depend on 2500 horfes, and 200 waggons from Virginia and Maryland; of which he only received 20 waggons and 200 horfes. In like manner did all his expectations come to little, merely through the difaffection and negligence of all the perfons with whom he had any dealings. We may conceive the difficulties which Mr. Braddock met with in this terrible march, when we confider that he was obliged (to ufe his own expressions) to be continually employed in making a road, as he proceeded with infinite labour a-crofs mountains and rocks of an exceffive heighth, which are fleep, and divided by torrents and rivers.

In

In spight of all these difficulties, general Braddock was obliged to fet forward, on his march against fort du Quesne, which he did, as I have faid, on the 10th of june, with his little army in two divisions : at the head of the first, confisting of 1400 men, was the general himfelf, with the greatest part of the ammu-nition and artillery : the second, with the provisions, ftores, and heavy baggage, was led by col. Dunbar, (a man of great prudence and military judgment) with about 800 men, with orders to follow the general as faft as the fervice would admit. The general having by this means leffened his line of march, proceeded with great expedition, in hopes of being able to attack the enemy before they were joined by a detachment of 500 regular troops ; infomuch that he left the rear near forty miles behind. On the 8th of july he encamped within 10 miles of fort du Quesne; and on the 9th, in his march through the woods towards that fort, was attacked by a body of french and indians; the former in the front, and the latter on each fide, in ambufcade, which began with a quick and heavy fire upon the vanguard, under lieut. col. Gage, from the indians. Immediately the main body, in good order and high fpirits, advanced to fuftain them. Orders were then given to halt and form into battalia. At this juncture, the van falling back upon them in great confusion, a general pannic feized the whole body of the foldiery, and all attempts to rally them proved utterly ineffectual; but being rallied by their officers, with much difficulty they gave one fire : and even after they had fell back on the main body, they were with unfpeakable difficulty once more rallied by their officers, and ftood one fire from the enemy, but then without returning it, both regiments, fled with the utmost terror and precipitation, deferting their officers; all of whom, and the general, exerted their utmost activity to relieve the troops from their univerfal furprife and diforder : but they were equally deaf to intreaties and commands. During this fcene of confusion, they expended their ammunition in the wildeft, and most unmeaning fire. Some dif-charging their pieces on our parties, who were advanced from the main body for the recovery of the cannon. After three hours fpent in this melancholy fituation, enduring a terrible flaughter from (it may be faid) an invisible foe, orders were given to found a retreat, that the men might be brought to cover the waggons : these they furrounded but a short space of time; for the enemy's fire being again warmly renewed from the front and left flank, the whole army took to immediate flight; leaving behind them all the artillery, provisions, ammunition, baggage, military cheft, together with the general's cabinet, containing his inftructions, and other papers of confequence *. So great was the confternation of the foldiers, that it was impoffible to ftop their career, flying with the utmost precipitation three miles from the field of action; where only one hundred men began to make a more orderly retreat.

What the real ftrength of the enemy was, is to this day uncertain; but it has been very confidently reported, that they had upwards of 2000 regular forces, including the canadian militia, which in that country is equal in ufefulnefs to the regular troops from old France; befides confiderable numbers of indians, who were planted in ambufcade, and from whom our men fuffered by far the moft. On our fide the lofs was very great; but more particularly fo, in the death of feveral officers of great merit, who facrificed their lives for the fervice of their country, with fingular and heroic bravery. The general, after having five horfes fhot under him, received a wound in his lungs through his right arm, of which he died in four days. His fecretary, eldeft fon of major general Shirley, a

* The french fometime after published a large memorial, containing the conduct of the british ministry; and as vouchers to the facts advanced in the memorial, they published all the papers which they found in Mr. Braddeck's cabinet. gentleman of a very good character, was killed on the fpot, by a fhot through his head. Sir Peter Halket, colonel of the 44th regiment, was killed, with feveral other officers of diffinction. Mr. Orme, capt. Morris, both aid-de-camps, were wounded; as was lieut. col. Gage and Burton; befides many other officers both killed and wounded, who, if it had pleafed God to have fpared their lives, would in all probability hereafter have been ufeful ornaments to their country.

To what causes this unhappy defeat is to be ascribed, has been matter of much inquiry, and animated many debates. Some of the officers charged the defeat to the cowardice of the men; but in a representation they made to Mr. Shirley, by order of the crown, they in some measure apologize for their behaviour; alledging, that they were harraffed by duties unequal to their numbers, and dispirited through want of provifions: that time was not allowed them to drefs their food : that their water (the only liquor they had) was both scarce and of a bad quality : in fine, that the provincials had difheartened them, by repeated fuggeftions of their fears of a defeat, should they be attacked by indians; in which cafe the european method of fighting would be entirely unavailing. These were fome of the many mutual complaints on both fides; but there were fome partial and ill-defigning perfons, who, contrary to the general know-ledge and opinion of all that were in the leaft acquainted with the general's conduct; laid the ill fuccefs of the day to his door; but when we come to confider well the difficulties he met with, together with the politiveness of his orders, it will clearly appear, that very little of Mr. Braddock's conduct was through his own choice, but actual necessity. Many inconfiderate people have attacked the general's military capacity, alledging that the loss of the battle was owing to his rafhnefs; but I have been affured by feveral creditable gentlemen, who were eye-witneffes neffes of Mr. Braddock's actions that day, that he did moft incomparably well in every order which he gave, and in all his management of the march over the mountains to the moment he was killed, no man could poffibly fhew greater military fkill, or even more knowledge of the nature of the fervice on which he was fent : and as to the clamours that were raifed againft him in England, it was no more than would always attend a general who commanded in North America, that was attended with ill fuccefs, by reafon of the predominancy of the fpirit of party, which breathes throughout all the englifh colonies, more, if poffible, than in their mother country.

On the death of this brave though unfortunate general, the command of the troops devolved on col. Dunbar, who commanded the rear party, feveral miles fhort of the place of action. When the routed troops joined Dunbar's men, the terror diffufed itfelf through the whole army. In this fcene of dreadful confusion, the commander nor any of his officers were liftened to or regarded; infomuch, that the men, fearful of an unpurfuing enemy, had wafted all their ammunition, and fo much of their provision, for accelerating their flight, that Mr. Dunbar was obliged to fend for 30 horfe loads of the latter, before he reached fort Cumberland : where he arrived in a few days, with the fhattered remains of the english troops.

In this melancholy manner ended fo important an expedition. This defeat had the worft confequences imaginable; as it gave fo much fpirit and alacrity to our enemies afterwards; and went a great way in keeping the indians firm to their new allies: fo on the contrary, we fuffered by the battle, as much as the enemy gained; from that time, the indians in our intereft, defpifed us as not able even to protect ourfelves, and much lefs them; and that in a country where we were fo much more numerous than the french.

french. But the indians were not the only people terrified by Mr. Braddock's defeat ; an universal pannic feized on all our colonies, out of which they did not foon recover, and which confequently must have been of the greatest differvice to our cause. Many persons in England have taken great pains to find out by whofe ill conduct this battle was loft. But with a very little reflection it will appear plain, that no fingle perfon was the reason of it; but a chain of a thousand different accidents, and blunders in the ministers who planned the expedition, and the difaffection of the provincials to the fervice. The capital miftake of all, was the landing the troops at first in Virginia, whereas they ought certainly to have been landed in Penfilvania ; for Mr. Braddock could get neither provisions nor carriages in Virginia, both of which he might have had in great plenty in Penfilvania; and what was as material, the shortness of the rout to fort du Quesne, by way of Penfilvania, which would have fhortened their march at leaft fix weeks, and might have been performed with half the fatigue and expence of that, by way of Virginia. But in every fcheme which was planned by the then ministry in England, we find fo much fhort-fightednefs and fuch manifest weaknefs, that we cannot at all wonder at the ill fuccefs which attended their administration.

Let me afk any impartial perfon, in what manner he thinks the affairs of England could be carried on, when one minister had the supreme direction of the cabinet, and when that minister's only pretensions for the high employments he possessed was a parliamentary interest; without being acquainted with the true interests of the nation he governed, or possessing abilities to promote them.

Mirepoix, the french ambassador, sets out for France. King lands in England. Parliament meets. King's speech. Addreffes. Treaties with Hesse Cassel and Russia. Changes in the ministry. Reflections.

A T the beginning of the year 1754, the flate of affairs in Europe was much different from what it was in America; where war in reality was as much carried on as ever it was afterwards; but in Europe peace was avowed between the two nations; and while both kingdoms thought of preparing for that war, which most able men faw was nigh, still the ministers of each protested to each other, that war was the furtheft from their thoughts; which affurances, on the part of England, I believe were extremely true; for though the proceedings of the french, even at that time, ought to have roufed the british mininiftry to refent it in the most enforsive manner; yet they knew very well, that to keep themfelves in the power they enjoyed, it was neceffary that the nation should not be led into a war with France; for then (as always was the cafe) the ministry in England must confequently fall in pieces.

In purfuance of fuch a plan, we find them practifing the loweft arts, and putting up with the greateft injuries, fooner than refent in a juft and rigorous manner, the wrongs their country had received. The french took notice of this defpicable behaviour, and refolved to turn it to their good : infomuch, that, no fooner did they find who they had to deal with, but they continued their encroachments in America with double double diligence. At laft, however, these peaceable ministers were obliged, whether they would or no, to fee the preparations that were making in all the ports of France, which they could not possibly do, without being alarmed; they as usual, applied to the french ambassiador at London; but his answers to their applications being too frivolous and quibbling, to be depended upon; they were obliged for fastety fake to arm, in their own defence. This measure, though too late, was certainly right, and might have been more effectual, had it been made use of earlier.

At this time, the duke de Mirepoix was employing all his abilities, to prevent the juft refentment of Great Britain against his nation, for the hostilities committed by the french in North America; with the most religious affurances that his court was fincerely inclined to adjust finally and expeditiously all disputes substituting between the two crowns in the new world *.

By fome trifling preparations which they made at Calais, Dunkirk, &c. they endeavoured to perfuade us, that they intended an invafion of England; but I think nothing in the world can be plainer, than that the french at that time had as much thoughts of of invading the moon, as ever they had of invading England. The nation was greatly alarmed; and twenty fifting boats on the coaft with a camp in a maritime province of France, we found fufficient to affrighten us into an immenfe expence to guard againft that danger which never was to come.

On the 25th of march, his majesty sent a meffage to the house of commons, in which he observes, That the present situation of affairs

* Vide the memorial which the french ambaffador delivered to the british ministry, the 5th of january, and the answer to it. This and many other curious pieces which I have quoted, are to be seen in the memorial published by the court of France, under the title of the conduct of the english ministry."

having made it neceflary for him to augment his forces by fea and land; and to take fuch other measures, as might best tend to preferve the general peace of Europe, and to fecure the just rights and possession of his crown in America; as well as to repel any attempts whatfoever that may be made to support or countenance any designs which may be formed against his majesty and his kingdoms; his majesty did not doubt of the concurrence and support of that house, in making such augmentations, &c. as the honour of his crown, the true interest of his people, and the fecurity of his dominions might require, in the prefent critical conjuncture of affairs.

In anfwer to this meffage, the lords and commons both prefented most loyal, dutiful and affectionate addreffes to his majefty.

But what was of more confequence, was the following refolution, which paffed the houfe of commons on the 26th, in confequence of the above meffage and addreffes : " That the fum of one million be granted to his majefty upon account, towards augmenting the forces by fea and land ; and taking fuch measures for the fecurity of his majefty's dominions, as may be neceffary in the prefent conjuncture."

No other material bufinefs was tranfacted this feffion. On the 25th of april his majefty came to the houfe, and having given his confent to fuch bills as were ready; he made a gracious fpeech to both houfes; after which, the lord chancellor, by his majefty's command, prorogued the parliament to the 27th of may.

In this manner ended this feffion of parliament; in my account of it I have been as brief as poffible; and indeed I fhould have omitted faying any thing of it, but I could not with propriety have made fuch omiffion, as it had a manifest connection with the war. For the future I defign to give no further account of the affairs of the parliament of England, than has any any material connection with the military part of this hiftory. In the feffion, of which I have juft fpoke, we find much unanimity and fleadinefs in following his majefty's will; and the grant of one million on account, fhows that the commons had a very good opinion of his majefty's defigns and meafures (at this time) in repelling the encroachments that were making in his dominions. It was very remarkable in this feffion, to fee the loyalty and affection of those members in the house, from whom no fuch extraordinary fidelity was expected; more particularly at this time.

His majefty having formed a defign of vifiting his german dominions this year, fet out from St. James's on the 28th of april, about five o'clock in the morning: he went over Weftminfter bridge in a poft chaife, through St. George's fields, over London bridge, and proceeded for Harwich, where he embarked; and in a little time landed fafe at Helvoetfluys in Holland, in his way to Hanover. Before his majefty's departure, he appointed feveral noblemen and others lords juffices for the administration of the government, during his majefty's abfence; at the head of whom was his royal highnefs the duke.

The only act of importance they did, was the ordering the duke de Mirepoix, the french ambassfador, to depart the kingdom in 24 hours : he received these orders on the 22d of july, and fet out for France on the 24th, at four o'clock in the morning, for fear of being infulted by the mob. Matters between the two nations were come to fuch a crifis, that it would have been a jest for the ambassfador to have stayed any longer.

On the 16th of feptember his majefty landed at Margate from Holland, and the fame day arrived fafe at Kenfington; being convoyed in his paffage by my lord Anfon, with the following fhips:

I have before faid that the parliament was prorogued to may 27; after feveral adjournments, it met the 12th of november. In his majefty's fpeech he mentioned two treaties which he had concluded with the empress of Ruffia and the landgrave of Heffe Caffel, which foon after occafioned a warm debate in the houfe of lords; for the duke of Marlborough flood up and moved for an address of thanks; in which motion there were feveral expressions which feemed to imply an approbation of those treaties : this was, by feveral, objected to; but the motion was feconded by the earl of Marchmont: many amendments were propofed, and it occafioned a long debate, in which the duke of Marlborough, the earl of Marchmont, the duke of Bedford, the duke of Newcastle, the lord chancellor, and the earl of Granville, fpoke for the motion; and the earl Temple, the earl of Pomfret, and the lord Tal-bot against it : also, the earl of Hallifax spoke particularly against the treaties ; but upon the queftion's being put, the motion was agreed to without a division.

In the addrefs of the commons were thefe expreffions, " And we think ourfelves bound in juffice and gratitude to affift your majefty againft infults and attacks that may be made againft any of your majefty's dominions, though not belonging to the crown of Great Britain," which occafioned a very long debate; but it was agreed to at laft, though not without being thought by many, a little extraordinary. The affurances affurances of affiftance which were made his majefty; the reader will find hereafter were fully made good.

I am now come to give the reader an account of a transaction which occasioned much discourse; I mean the treaties with Hesse Cassel and Russia; a measure as much praised by some, as it was condemned by others. The following is an extract from that with Hesse Cassel, figned at Hanover june 18.

I. The prince of Heffe engages to hold in readinefs 8000 men, of which 1400 are to be horfe, during four years from the figning this treaty, for the fervice of his britannic majefty, to march immediately after being required, if for the defence of the low countries; and within two months, if for the defence of England or Hanover. To be commanded by heffian officers, and to fwear fidelity to the king of Great Britain, upon their being firft muftered by an englifh commiffary.

II. Each battalion of foot to have two field pieces.

III. His majefty engages to pay for every trooper or dragoon 80 crowns banco, and for every foot foldier 30 crowns banco.

IV. The king engages to pay, during this treaty, an annual fubfidy of 150,000 crowns banco, the crown reckoned at four fhillings and ninepence three farthings, englifh money, from the time of figning the treaty, till the troops fhall be required to march, and 300,000 crowns from their being required to march, till they enter into the pay of his majefty; and from their entering into fuch pay, the landgrave to enjoy an annual fubfidy of 150,000 crowns. When the troops fhall be again fent back, the fubfidy fhall be again raifed to 300,000, which fhall be annually paid from the time of their entering the landgrave's territories to the expiration of the treaty.

V. If these troops are required to serve in Germany, they shall be put on the same foot with his majesty's forces; and if in England or Ireland, on the same foot with his british forces. VI. If any of these troops shall be cut off, or the artillery lost or destroyed, his majesty shall destray all expenses of recruiting and remounting them, and make good the loss of the guns.

VII. The king fhall keep thefe troops in his fervice during all the time of the treaty, and employ them where he pleafes, provided it be not on board the fleet, or beyond the feas.

VIII. The king fhall fend back thefe troops if the landgrave fhould be attacked, paying them a month's pay, and furnifhing them with transport veffels at his own expence, affording him the fuccour of fuch other troops as the cafe fhall require, to be continued till entire fecurity is obtained. The landgrave of Heffe alfo engages, that if his majefty fhall be attacked, he will yield him all the fuccour in his power, and continue it till an advantageous peace fhall be concluded.

IX. To claim the fuccours flipulated by this treaty, it fhall fuffice, that either of the parties are attacked by force of arms, without having used open force against him who attacks him.

X. This body of 8000 fhall be augmented to 12000, if his majefty fhall require it, on the fame conditions; the additional body of 4000 men to be ready fix months after demanded, and the fubfidy for them to commence from the time of the demand.

XI. This treaty shall subsist for four years.

XII. The ratifications to be exchanged fix months after the fignature.

Such was the treaty with Heffe Caffel, and, the better to make my remarks upon it, I fhall give the reader an abftract of that with Ruffia, figned at Peterfburgh 30 feptember, N. S. when by comparing them together we fhall be the better able to judge of the wifdom of the englifh miniftry in concluding thefe two treaties.

Treaty

Treaty with Ruffia.

I. Recites, that the empress has, for the mutual defence of herself and his majesty, at all events marched to the frontiers of Livonia, adjoining to Lithuania, 55000 men, of which 40000 are infantry of her regular troops, and 15000 cavalry; and stipulates, that they shall continue there as long as the present convention shall subsist.

II. The empress engages to hold in readiness on the coafts of that province, during the fame time, 40 or 50 gallies with their crews, in condition to act on the first notice.

III. Thefe troops and gallies fhall not act, except his britannic majefty or his allies are attacked, and then the commanding officer, as foon as he fhall receive his majefty's requifitions, fhall make a diverfion with 30,000 of the infantry, and all the 15,000 cavalry, and at the fame time fhall embark the other 10,000 infantry on board the gallies, in order to make a defcent, according to the exigency of the cafe.

IV. If his majefty's german dominions shall be attacked, the empress will regard it as a case of the alliance of 1742.

V. His majefty engages to pay 500,000 l. sterling per annum, in confideration of this fervice, from the time the russian troops shall, in confequence of his requisition, pass the frontiers of their country. The payment to be always four months in advance, the first to be on the day the troops pass the frontiers.

VI. The empress takes upon herself the subsistance and payment of these troops both by sea and land.

VII. The emprefs engages not to recall these troops, even though she herself should be attacked by any other power; and his majesty promises, that in such case, he will immediately furnish the succour stipulated in the treaty of 1742.

VIII. If, contrary to all expectation, a war fhould break out, his majefty fhall fend into the Baltick a fquadron of force fuitable to the circumftances, to act in concert with the ruffian army, as long as they fhall be within reach of each other.

IX. A britifh commiffary and admiral fhall always affift in councils of war, with the ruffian commander of the auxiliary troops.

X. The ruffians shall be entitled to all plunder.

XI. The king engages to procure a paffage for these troops through Poland, if necessary.

XII. This convention to fubfift four years.

XIII. If peace be made, or the object of the diverion ceafes within four years, the ruffian troops then to return and enjoy the fuccour agreed on three months. If no peace, the parties to agree on the prolongation of the convention.

XIV. The convention to be ratified within two months.

A feparate and fecret article.

His majefty engages to pay 100,000 l. per ann. always one year in advance, from the ratification of this treaty to the march of the troops beyond the frontier, when the payment of 500,000 l. per ann. is to commence in its flead.

Without confidering the neceffity, if there was any, of thefe treaties, and the goodnefs of them, we fhould obferve, that by the fifth article of the treaty with Heffe, it is agreed, that every trooper fhall firft be purchafed at about 20 l. fterling, and every foot foldier at about 7l. which in all makes about 112,000 l. levy money; befides this, the landgrave is to have about 37,000 l. annually before the troops march; and as foon as they march, he is to receive 74,000 l. annually, till they enter into pay, according to that of Hanover or England; at which time the fubfidy returns to about 37,000 l. annually; which again, when the troops are fent back, is (37) is to return to 74,000 l. a year, during the whole duration of the treaty.

By the compact with Ruffia, the empress is to affift England with 55,000 troops, and to transport and maintain them for the annual fublidy of 500,000 l. without any further confideration for death of men and horfes, or lofs of military ftores, and no return of them is to take place during the duration of the treaty, even though the empress herfelf should be attacked. The reader need not be told how infinitely more advantageous the treaty with Ruffia was, than that with Heffe Caffel, for it explains itfelf: who would have imagined, that we fhould ever have preferred the affiltance of 8000 heffians, before a fupply of ruffians, when the former was ten times as expenfive as the latter; but still this amazing folly (if I may be allowed the expression) afterwards appeared in the british councils, as we shall fee hereafter.

If we confider the treaty with Ruffia, it will appear very plain that it was intended against the king of Pruffia; for it is agreed by the fecond article, that these troops are to be held in readiness on the frontiers of Livonia, and the gallies cruizing on that coaft : and that, on his majefty's requisition, the commanding officer shall make a diversion with 20,000 infantry, and 15,000 cavalry, which speaks in fo many words that they were defigned against his pruffian majefty. It feems that the british court, was at this time very jealous of that monarch's intentions; they were fearful he intended to attack Hanover, and to guard against this danger (whether or not it was a real one, I am not able to fay) they thought it neceffary to conclude the treaty abovementioned with Ruffia. Against what other power could this treaty be defigned? It was impoffible that the ruffians were to attack France, or defend us against the french, for gallies are quite unfit for the ocean ; befides which, the article of their making a defcent with 10,000 men fufficiently fpeaks that they were intended to further the operation of the land army. In fhort, from every article of this treaty, it appears to be manifeftly intended to defend the electorate of .Hanover against the fupposed ill intentions of his pruffian majesty. But the affairs of Europe took such a course afterwards, as made this treaty (for that purpose at least) useles. But let the merit of them be ever so much extolled, they will appear to me to be but a very short-sighted remedy for the mischief they were intended to prevent. And I freely own the management in making them, is to ointricate for me to pretend to unravel.

In the middle of november, there happened feveral changes in the ministry. Sir Thomas Robinson refigned the feals, and was made keeper of the rolls; in the room of lord Barrington, who was made fecretary at war; Mr. Fox being removed from the war office and made fecretary of state. And foon after appeared a new commission for the treasury, confisting of the following lords; the duke of Newcaftle, first lord commissioner, the earl of Darlington, fir George Lyttleton, Thomas Hay, and Robert Newgent efgrs. at the fame time, fir George Lyttleton was made chancellor of the exchequer, in the room of Mr. Legge. But this new fet of minifters did not hold together long, for we find, that on the 16th of december, the earl of Darlington, and Mr. Hay, removed from the treafury, and were appointed paymasters general in the room of Mr. Pitt; and earl Gower fworn of the privy-council, and keeper of the privy feal; and the duke of Marlborough made mafter general of the ordnance: the fame day, lord Anfon, fir William Rowley, William Ponfonby, Thomas Villiers, Edward Bofcawen, Richard Edgecumbe, efqrs. and lord Bateman were conffituted lords of the admiralty.

Such were the men, who were at this time fet at the head of affairs; but only a few of them were concerned concerned or confulted in the administration of the most material affairs of the state.

From the face our affairs wore at the beginning of this war, we fhall not have great reafon to exult in our fuccefs. The reader has feen the begining of a war between the two nations; and if we confider what the french made the aim and end of all their proceedings, namely, that tract of land in America, on the river Ohio (of which I have spoke fo particularly in the former chapter) or as the french were pleafed to term it, for a " few barren acres," we shall certainly conclude, that they in a manner got their defires accomplished. Indeed I have shown how loyal and unanimous the parliament of Great Britain was in their refolutions to fupport and defend his majefty's right to the utmost; but I believe the reader will join with me in being of opinion, that all the neceffary meafures to hinder a rupture with France from taking place, were not exerted. But this we fhall be able to judge of clearly by and by, when we come to be further acquainted with the ftate of the quarrel, when it was more advanced, from its infancy.

CHAP. III.

Naval affairs in Europe, during the year 1755. Great diligence used by both nations to equip several squadrons. Macnamara sails from Brest; and Boscawen from Portsmouth. Alcide and Lys taken. Holbourn sails from Spithead. Du Guay arrives at Cadiz. Hawke sails to intercept him. Returns without doing it. Byng sails from Spithead. Court martial on lord Harry Powlett. Boscawen arrives at Spithead. Reflections.

HE naval affairs of the two nations were not neg-lected. And indeed the english were more forward by feathan by land, that is naturally their element; and, if that nation would more confine its military views by land, and exert them more by fea, they would foon convince their neighbours how impolitic it would be to break with them. But we find that both nations at this period were extremely diligent in preparing their maritime forces for any exigency of affairs that might happen. So early as january 1754, in England, imprefs warrants were iffued by the lords of the admiralty; and in two days time upwards of 2000 feamen were taken on the river Thames; to man (as it was then given out) a fquadron for the East-Indies : and the prefs continued with great violence in moft of the ports of England, feveral thoufand able hands were picked up, and many entered themfelves voluntarily.

Neither were the french indolent; but with their ulual diligence were very vigorous in their naval preparations; and in the beginning of 1755, laid a general embargo on all the ports of France, to man with the utmost expedition, a fleet which was fitting out in Breft; and io early as the first of january, fir Thomas Robinson, one of his majesty's principal fccretaries of state, was informed by de Cosne, the fecretary fecretary of the embaffy at Paris, that feventeen men of war were ordered to be equipped at Breft; the admiral's fhip to be of 70 guns, and that the greateft part of this fleet was defined for America. In the fequel we shall find, that de Cosne's advice proved true; but he was not the only one that fent this intelligence to the ministry in England, for it was re-peated from many places, particularly from Paris, with many additional circumftances. And indeed the truth was, that the french exerted at this time all their diligence and industry to forward their preparations for getting a ftrong fquadron to fea, which at that time was advancing very fast at Brest, where they worked night and day to fit the ships for sea. Nor were these armaments confined to Breft only, Rochfort and Toulon were filled with workmen; but matters were not fo forward there as at Breft, the fquadron at which port was expected to be ready to fail by the middle of april; but in this calculation, the french were mistaken. Many of the ships that were to compose this fquadron, were to carry no more than 20 or 22 guns, as they were defigned for the transporting a large body of land forces. However, although the orders from court were pofitive, the wind would not permit this fleet to fail till the third of may; at which time it did with fo fair a wind, that it was out of fight in a fhort time. This grand fleet confifted of 18 fail of the line and 9 frigates, carrying 1532 guns.

On the 20th of may Macnamara the admiral, returned to Breft, with nine fhips of the line, having convoyed the transports beyond the capes; and left them to proceed to Canada, according to their inftructions, with a fair wind.

Now we have feen the french fleet to fea, it is neceffary to return, and take notice of what had been doing in England by fea during that time. The miniftry here, were very active in their naval preparations, to get the english fleet to fea as foon as that of France : France; and indeed they were before the french by a fortnight; for admiral Bofcawen failed from Portfmouth the 19th of april, with 13 fail of the line, and one frigate, carrying 738 guns, and 5300 men.

The reader only need compare the force of thefe two fleets together, and he will at first fight perceive the great overfight in the ministry's fending fourteen fhips to intercept twenty-feven. And yet this egregious omiffion in british politicks, was still out-done by the remedy which was applied to supply the former defect. That of fending fix ships of the line and one frigate, under admiral Holbourn, to follow Mr. Bofcawen; who did not fail till the 11th of may, when it was fcarce possible for him to escape Macnamara's fleet, which had failed but eight days before. And yet, this was the only effort made by the british ministry for feveral months, to counteract the vigorous armaments of the whole naval power of France.

His orders were to join Mr. Boscawen as foon as poffible; but this he was not able to perform, till the 21st of june, when he met with admiral Boscawen's squadron, formed in a line before the river St. Lawrence, cruifing on the banks of Newfoundland the fame ship which brought the news of this junction, alfo acquainted the ministry with the capture of the Lys and Alcide, two french men of war in de la Mothe's fquadron : these ships having parted from the reft, fell in with the english squadron, the admiral of which ordered the Dunkirk, Torbay, and Monarque to chace; and the Dunkirk coming up first with the Alcide, hailed the captain, requiring him to put back, and come under the admiral's stern ; the frenchman in reply, asked if it was peace or war; captain Howe (the commander of the Dunkirk) faid he did not know, but repeated his orders; the frenchman again afked, if it was peace or war; and captain Howe again replied, he knew not, but would have him prepare for the worft, as he every moment expected a fignal from the admiral to fire upon him for not coming to. At the fame time, obferving fome foldiers, and land officers, with feveral ladies, ftanding very thick upon deck, he admonifhed them to go down; they foon complied, and the frenchman, not waiting for captain Howe's broadfide, immediately fired upon him. The other french man of war ftruck to the Torbay and Monarque. This is the most probable account we had of this action; many people doubted whether there was any conversation at all between the two captains; but I have been affured by undoubted authority that there was *.

In the mean time the french were in fome pain for their fquadron in America, left it fhould be met with and intercepted in its return from thence : to remedy which, in the beft manner they were able, they fent the nine fhips with which M. de Macnamara returned to Breft, under the command of M. du Guay, a french admiral to favour their return, who fet fail from Breft on the 4th of june.

His orders were to cruife on the coast of Portugal, to favour the return of M. la Mothe and Salvert, in case of bad news from America; du Guay cruifed in the Atlantic ocean, near the streights of Gibraltar; but not meeting with the other french fleet, which did not return till fome time afterwards, put into Cadiz; and during his stay in that place, the english ministry dispatched fir Edward Hawke on the 24th of july, with 21 ships of the line, and five

* The Dunkirk's guns in this fight were all double-fhotted every round, and being yard-arm and yard-arm, did fuch terrible execution, that the officers of the Alcide could not keep the men to their quarters, and ran one of them through in order to deter the others; but all would not do, the frenchmen not liking fuch warm work; and M. le commodore himfelf, when he was brought prifoner on board the Dunkirk, told the brave captain Howe, that it was cruel to engage fo very clofe. frigates to intercept him, in his return to Breft, or any other french fhips that might efcape Mr. Bofcawen. But this meafure was much condemned by thofe who were knowing in fea affairs; for, according to the advices which the miniftry received concerning the naval armaments of the french, it was probable, that Hawke might fall in with du Guay's fquadron of nine fhips, joined by five fhips from Rochfort, and ten from Breft, (both which were ready to fail from that port;) and ten fhips in their return from America. By which it appears, that Hawke with 21 fhips might very poffibly have fell in with 35 french ones; and I believe the miniftry that planned his expedition, had not fo very great an opinion of englifh courage as to fuppole that Hawke would (in cafe of a battle) have come off conqueror.

Sir Edward Hawke's orders were to cruife off cape Finisterre, till the french ships should appear. If we are to judge of the wifdom of these orders by the fuccefs they met with, the reader, I believe, will not admire the prudence of them; for M. du Guay, as foon as he heard where Hawke was stationed, and what was his bufinefs, failed from Cadiz for Breft; but not in the ufual tract, which he did to avoid the english fleet; he steered directly west from Spain into the Atlantic ocean; when, being at a great distance from the coaft, he changed his courfe, and ftood directly for the land's end of England; by this precaution of failing west to a great distance, before he fteered towards the channel, he passed on the outfide of all our fleet, cruifing at cape Finisterre, and arriving fafe in the channel, fell in behind it with his iquadron, and got fafe into the harbour of Breft, having left Cadiz the beginning of august. Sir Edward Hawke not having been successful in the cruife he was fent upon, was called home, where, however however he did not arrive till the 29th of feptember *.

As to admiral Byng's expedition, or rather cruife, which he went upon the 14th of october, with ten fail of the line, being the weftern fquadron; it did not afford much fpeculation for hiftory. It is enough to fay, that he returned the 22d of november, not having done any action of confequence.

I shall here present the reader with an affair, that reflected no great honour on the perfon chiefly concerned. I mean, the court martial on lord Harry Powlett. It feems lord Harry commanded his majesty's ship the Barfleur, one of the squadron with which fir Edward Hawke was fent to intercept the french admiral, du Guay. The cafe was this; in confequence of verbal orders from fir Edward Hawke on the the 23d of august, in the morning, lord Harry Powlett in the Barfleur, gave chafe to a fail in the fouth eaft, which he purfued all night, and next morning was unable to find the fleet; and finding his rudder in a very bad condition, was obliged to put into port, without orders for fo doing from the admiral. And for this action capt. Powlett was tried by a court martial, held on board the Prince George in Portfmouth harbour, the 20th, 21ft, and 22d of october.

The following were the members that composed this court, viz.

Henry Ofborne, elq. vice-admiral of the red, prefident.

Capt. Roger Martin,

Hon. capt. John Hamilton,

* I fhould here mention a pretty extraordinary inftance of the feigned politeness of our enemies the french; or rather of their pretended justice: I mean the capture which M. du Guay's squadron made, in its return to Breft, of the Blandford man of war of 20 guns, having governor Lyttleton on board for Carolina, and which was afterwards reflored by order of the french court; I leave my readers to reflect on this piece of politeness.

Capt.

Capt. George Bridges Rodney, Capt. John Montague, Hon. capt. George Murray, Capt. Thomas Fowke, Capt. Richard Tyrrel, Capt. William Lloyd, Capt. R. Edwards.

(44)

The court having heard the evidence, and alfo what the prifoner had to offer, were of opinion, that he did not judge and act right in giving chace on the 24th of august, to a fail feen in the fouth-west, when three fail were feen in the north-east, which might probably be part of the fleet; but it having clearly appeared to them, that his intentions were upright towards the fervice, as he had before used his utmost endeavours to rejoin the fleet, on the station it was in, when he separated from it, and did afterwards use the like endeavours to join it on the rendezvous, they do not think this error deserving of punishment, and do therefore unanimously only judge it proper to admonish him, as he is hereby admonished to be more cautious in his future conduct.

As to his returning into port, the court are of opinion, that, confidering the defects of the fhip's rudder, his proceeding therein was very juftifiable, and therefore they do unanimoufly acquit him of all blame upon that account; and he is hereby acquitted accordingly *.

It requires much caution to reflect on fuch unlucky affairs as thefe. It is impoffible for any perfon to be able to fay, whether the court martial on lord Harry Powlett acted juftly or not; but a private man is not to find fault with the proceedings of a court of juftice : thus much I may be allowed to fay, the nation was not pleafed with their fentence, with how much reafon, I will not determine; but only obferve, that lord Harry Powlett has never been employed fince, in any flation of importance. Such was the determination of this unfortunate affair. The nation, in general, at this time, was eager to have every military offender feverely punifhed. At the eve of a war, examples of a juft feverity are, certainly neceffary; but more particularly fo, when a conftant train of ill fuccefs had baffled all our military undertakings. At the beginning of every war, it is neceffary to roufe the englifh from that fatal confufed inactivity, which fo diftinguifhes their councils from thofe of many other nations. But when once the fpirit of the people is raifed, it is then that englifh courage becomes fuccefsful, to the terror of their enemies.

CHAP. IV.

American affairs to the end of the year 1755. The chief command in North America falls on major general Shirley. His march to Oswego. Dunbar marches to Philadelphia. Battle at Lake George. Transactions at New York. Grand council of war. Plan of operations for the ensuing year agreed on. Reflections on the fruitles campaign of 1755.

Left (at the end of the first chap.) general Braddock utterly defeated by the french, and flain; on his unfortunate catastrophe, the command of his majefty's forces in North America devolved on major general Shirley, who having left New York, arrived at Albany in the beginning of july. This city was then the grand theatre for all the preparations, for the northern expedition against Crown Point, as well as that to the westward, for the reduction of Niagara. The general, on his arrival here, did not find the military preparations in fuch forwardness as he had reafon to expect; infomuch, that he was obliged to wait at Albany on feveral difagreeable accounts; but his own troops were, in the mean time filing off, in different divisions from Schenactady, towards Ofwego.

Ofwego has long been the accuftomed route, it is computed to be about 300 miles weft from Albany, was formerly garrifoned by twenty-five men; but on the commencement of the late difputes the number was augmented to fifty; and early this fpring fifty more were ordered up: and at the latter end of may capt. Bradftreet arrived there with two hundred, befides workmen to be employed in the naval preparations, purfuant to the fcheme concerted in the congrefs of commiffioners at Albany the laft fummer. On the 24th of july, general Shirley arrived at Schenactady, nectada, where he found lieut. col. Ellison had embarked the day before, with the 5th division of the 50th regiment, for Ofwego; and that lieut. col. Mercer with five companies of the 51st, and one of the 50th, were still remaining for want of battoe-men. On the 29th, the general embarked with 97 battoes, loaded with military flores, provisions and other neceffaries for the expedition; together with about 200 regular troops, 150 battoe men, and 40 indians, for Ofwego; leaving orders for lieut. col. Mercer to follow him as foon as poffible.

At laft, on the 18th of august, Mr. Shirley arrived at Ofwego. He found the works there in a very bad condition; the chief ftrength of the fort, was its being mounted with five fmall cannon, three or four pounders; it confifted of a ftone wall, and was fituated on the fouth edge of lake Ontario.

As foon as he arrived there, he took a furvey of the fortifications, and the adjacent country; and gave orders for erecting on the point, a ftrong log pallifaded fort, capable of mounting large cannon, and containing barracks for 300 men, which, from the dimensions of its logs, might be defensible against three or four pounders; and, if it should be thought requisite to have a strong, regular fortification built round it another year, it would be of fer-vice whilft the new works were erecting; and for fecuring the place to the fouthward of the old fort, he determined, as foon as hands and time could be spared for it, to have a small square fort of earth and masonry, with four bastions, a rampart, parapet and ditch, containing barracks for 200 men, built on the other eminence.

General Shirley, during his ftay, received feveral accounts of the ftrength and deligns of the french at Niagara, which made him refolve upon an expedition thither; and the works of the new fort which he was building at Ofwego, were fo far advanced, that he hoped it might be ready in a few days days to receive its artillery, he proposed to proceed to Niagara, with 600 regulars, befides the albany men and indians, and a fmall train of artillery; and having ordered the preparations to be forthwith made for the intended attempt; the 600 troops were drafted, and held themfelves in readiness to embark. One great inducement for Mr. Shirley to perfist in the refolution he had taken to attack Niagara, was the arrival of eight battoes at Ofwego, on the 27th of feptember, containing forty barrels of flower, and thirteen of bread, which were the species of provisions wanted.

The reader will no doubted be furprifed when he hears, that for all the advantages attending the Niagara expedition, yet it was laid afide by the general-till the next year. The confiderations which had the greateft weight with him, to induce him to take this refolution, were thefe : that nothing more could have been done that year (fuppofing he had got the troops and artillery fafe before it) than to diflodge the french and demolish the works, as the state of his provifions would not admit of his leaving a garrifon there, during the winter, for its defence; fo that an effectual poffeffion of that pafs could not have been taken that year; whereas, in the mean time, during the abfence of the veffels from Ofwego (all of which, it was neceffary for Mr. Shirley to have taken with him upon his attempt against Niagara) it would have been in the power of the french to have transported a trainof artillery without opposition, a-cross the lake to fort Frontenac, and have landed them near the eminence, behind the old fort of Ofwego, where the intended new fort was not begun to be built ; in which cafe, they might not only have made themfelves mafters of Ofwego, but must have cut off Mr. Shirley's return from Niagara; which would have been fatal likewife to the troops.

Such were the reafons given by Mr. Shirley and his friends, for not proceeding against Niagara; certainly the the argument used to perfuade us, that the scheme was really impossible to be executed successfully, is entirely fallacious, and its very foundation is sapped, when we come to enquire, why the works which Mr. Shirley erected at Ofwego were not finished, or at least fo far in fowardness, as to permit him to attempt the expedition : nor can I conceive, that it was fo utterly impossible to leave a garrifon in Niagara during the winter, fince by the fituation of that fort the french would not have been able to make themfelves masters of it in that seafon, with the force which it was in their power to use against it. But one of the greatest objections to the against he but general's opinion is, his pretending that he could not leave the garrison in Niagara, by reason of the fcarcity of provisions; for it will be very palpable to the reader that the general did not use his y purpose care in that article of providing provisions, at least in fo great a degree as is pretended by his friends: it is very plain by the other parts of his conduct in this expedition, that he was well provided with every thing but provision; and that he was not fo very badly off in that regard as is pretended.

The difficulty which the general met with in for-warding the two forts, he was building, was certainly great; but not in fo great a degree as has been thought: It fhould be confidered, that they were erected without any regular engineer, (an officer though, I fhould fuppofe Mr. Shirley might have procured) at the difance of 300 miles from any english fettlement, where a larger supply of proper workmen and ma-terials for strong fortifications could not be had; and the bad weather retarded his expedition confiderably; befides which, part of their time was taken up in finishing a vessel then building for his majesty's fervice, in order to preferve the command of lake Ontario; together with a large hospital and barracks for winter quarters, to contain upwards of 900 men; the timber for all which, was to be cut from the ftem, ftem, and the ground on which the forts were building, to be cleared of the trees and underwood, with which it was covered.

The general having fettled thefe matters at Ofwego, and finding a great acceffion of bufinefs advance, upon the death of general Braddock, began to think of leaving Ofwego, and proceeding to the colony of Maffachufet's bay, of which he was governor.

Upon his departure, he left orders with the commanding officer of the garrifon to finifh the two forts in his abfence; for although Mr. Shirley had fpent fo much time at Ofwego, yet thefe forts were not near complete; but to affift the commanding officer in furnifhing and ftrengthening them, and the other works, he fent two engir eers as early in the fpring as he could.

I remarked before, that Mr. Shirley calculated thefe forts more for defence againft mufketry and fmall cannon of two or three pound ball, than large battering ones: for fecuring the forts againft fuch as might be conveyed by the french on the lake, he depended upon having a fuperior naval force on the lake Ontario; on fuppolition that, if his majefty's veffels kept the command of the lake, it would be impracticable for the french to attack Ofwego. Having fettled thefe matters, the general fet out on the 24th of October, in a whale boat, attended by fome battoes; and arrived at Albany the 4th of november.

Such was the end of the Ofwego expedition: the fervice which the general did there, had its ufes; but he completed nothing; more might have been expected, confidering the time he fpent there; he certainly might (from the feveral accounts which we have of this tranfaction) have left Ofwego in fuch a condition, as to have had nothing to fear from a french invafion; the great difficulty of transporting cannon in that wild country, did indeed, in fome measure, infure the fafty of the fort; but then we find find that the general was ftrangely out, in his imagining, that he rendered the lake fecure by his naval force; he ought certainly to have left Ofwego in fuch a condition, as to have been able to refift any force that the french could bring against it, by any road whatever, whether by land or the lake; and this furely the general might have done, in the time he fpent there.

I shall now pursue the account I gave of the mi-litary transactions under colonel Dunbar, in the fouthern colonies. Having reached fort Cumberland, he difpatched an indian express to general Shirley, with an account of the defeat, and the necessary returns refpecting the troops under his' command; acquainting him, moreover, with his intention of marching to Philadelphia, and his hopes of meeting his orders at Shippensburg. About the fame time Mr. Dinwiddie wrote to Dunbar, propofing a fecond attempt on fort du Quesne; but a council being thereupon held, the members of which were col. Dunbar, lieut. col, Gage, governor Sharpe, major Chapman, major Sparke, and fir John St. Clair, it was unanimoufly conceived, that Mr. Dinwiddie's fcheme was imprac-The very next day, being the 2d of august, ticable. Dunbar began his march towards Philadelphia, with 1600 men, four fix pounders, and as many cohorns; leaving behind him the Virginia and Maryland companies, and about 400 wounded. At this fudden departure of the forces, the Virginians were extreme-ly difobliged, as not only exposing their frontiers and occasioning the daily defertion of their provincials; but because the enemy in flying parties, penetrated into the province, and on many of the inhabitants committed robberies and murder. Dunbar certainly acted right in retreating to Philadelphia; for this rea-fon, becaufe in that province was feated one of the most confiderable cities in all our plantations, which would have been of greater consequence to the french to conquer, than ten times the number of scattered fettlements. E 3 fettlements in Virginia, of which that whole province confifts.

Upon the advices received from Dunbar, Mr. Shirley gave orders for renewing the attempt; if the fouthern colonies would readily afford him a competent reinforcement : governor Morris having convened the Penfilvania affembly, he informed them of the retreat of the english army, and in a well drawn pathetic fpeech, preffed them to vigorous measures for the defence of their borders. They proceeded 10 far, as to vote the raifing 50,000 l. but offering a bill for. taxing the proprietary eftate, an immediate rupture enfued; and in this manner broke up an affembly of as obstinate v-----s, as any fellons that ever were fent over from Great Britain thither for flaves. Virginia being almost equally open to the irruptions of the enemy, four companies of rangers were ordered out, and the affembly voted 40,000 l. for furnishing 1000 men for the defence of their frontier. About the fame time the council and affembly of New Jerfey met, and the latter voted 30,000 l. for the public fervice; but as the house proposed to prolong the currency of the bills for nine years, to which Mr. Belcher (the governor) not being able to affent, 15,000 l. only, was raifed, and its ufe reftricted to keeping on foot her regiment at Ofwego, commanded by col. Schuyler. At New York, the house of representatives affembled on the 5th of august, and set out with a generous fpirit. They refolved to reinforce the provincial army deftined for Crown Point with 400, the bill was actually paffed the house for that purpose; but it afterwards dropped.

About a month before the departure of general Shirley from Ofwego, major general Lyman being advanced with the troops to the carrying place, about 60 miles from Albany, was waiting the arrival of general Johnfon, who fet out from thence the 8th of august, with the train of artillery. Lyman had begun a fort at the landing, on the east fide of Hudfon's fon's river, now called fort Edward. About the latter end of the month, general Johnfon, with the main body, moved forward, 14 miles more northerly, and pitched his camp at the fouth end of lake George, before called lake Sacrament. By fome indians, who had been fent as fcouts, he received the following advices : that they had difcovered a party of french and indians at Ticonderoga, fituated on the ifthmus between the north end of lake George and the fouthern part of the lake Champlain, 15 miles on this fide Crown Point; but no works were then thrown up. To have fecured this pafs, which commanded the route to Crown Point, through the lake, had been a meafure extremely adviseable. Mr. Johnson, informed of its importance, on the 1st of september, wrote to general Shirley, that he was impatient to get up his battoes; proposing then to proceed with part of the troops, and feize upon that pass; the french however took advantage of this delay of general Shirley's, and cut out work enough for him at his own camp.

The french fleet, which admiral Boscawen failed in the fpring to intercept, carried over, as I have elfewhere mentioned, the troops destined for the defence of Canada, with Monf. de Vaudreuil, governor general, and the baron de Dieskau, commander of the forces. The french court well apprifed of the fingular confequence of Ofwego, had determined to reduce it. Such being the baron's inftructions, he immediately proceeded to Montreal, from whence he detached 700 of his troops up the river, intending himfelf fpeedily to join them with the remainder. Just before he had made the necessary preparations, Montreal was alarmed with the news of our forming a numerous army near lake St. Sacrament, for the reduction of fort Frederick, and perhaps to pe-Whereupon, a netrate into the heart of Canada. Whereupon, a grand council being held, the baron was importuned to proceed through lake Champlain, for the defence of

of that fortrefs : nor was he without great difficulty prevailed upon to alter his intended route.

It feems that the baron de Dieskau, waited in expectation of our army coming up to give him battle; but being difappointed therein, he refolved to advance against Johnson; designing, if he proved victorious, to lay wafte all our northern colonies, lay the towns of Albany and Schenectady in afhes, and cut off all communication with Ofwego. For the execution of which defign, he embarked at fort St. Frederick, with 2000 men in battoes, and landed at the fouth bay, about 16 miles from the english encampment; his defign was, first to attack and make himself master of fort Edward, and then attack Mr. Johnfon in his camp; this he proposed to his troops, and was heard with pleasure by the regulars of his army; but the canadians and the militia were very much averfe to that plan, they agreed to the attack of the general in his camp, as they expected to meet with no cannon to oppose them; in this however they were miftaken, for the english artillery was got up to the camp from fort Edward a day or two before theaction, and of which the french had no intelligence. Dieskau, thus disappointed in his principal design, changed his route, and began to move against the main body at the lake. General Johnson had received advice by his indian fcouts, that the enemy was marching towards fort Edward, where 250 of the New Hampshire regiment, and five companies of the New York regiment were posted, under the command of col. Blanchard; this was on the 7th of feptember, and the next morning a council of war was held, in which it was agreed to detach 1000 men, in order, either to fuccour fort Edward, or meet the french general in his return from that poft, whether he was victorious or not. Accordingly this body of men marched about nine o'clock, under the command of col. Williams, an officer much effeemed for his perfonal bravery and good conduct.

The fituation of the english was this : they were encamped on the banks of lake George, being covered on either fide by a thick wooded fwamp; in the front, the general had thrown up a breaft work of trees felled, to which he drew up his cannon, that were afterwards of great fervice to him. The detachment under col. Williams was beat back by the french, about an hour and half after their departure ; being much inferior to the enemy.

About eleven, the enemy appeared in fight; they marched in a very regular order towards the center of the english army, till they were within 150 yards of the breast work; when, to the utter astonishment of the english general, Dieskau made a halt for fome time, which proved his ruin ; the english army was in fome confternation, and had the frenchman then began the attack, the fortune of the day might probably have been otherwife ; but when they found the french army made this ill-timed halt, their fpirits recovered, and they prepared to refift the enemy with an alacrity, which forboded the approaching victory. However, Diefkau began the attack, at the center of the english army, in good order, with his regulars : the canadians and indians were concealed among the fwamps, on the flanks of the english army, and maintained an irregular and fcattered fire. The first regular fire from the french were their regular's platoons, but did no great execution, being at too great a diftance; on which the english artillery, commanded by capt. Eyre, began to play, when the engagement became general on both fides; the french regulars behaved well, and kept their ground and order for fome time, with great refolution and good conduct; but the conftant fire from the english artillery, difordered them, when their fire became very faint : they then moved to the right, and attacked col. Williams, col. Ruggles, and col. Titcomb's regiments, where they maintained a very warm fire for near an hour, still keeping up their fire in the other parts parts of the line, but not very ftrong; the three regiments on the right, fupported the attack fo bravely, that the enemy was repulfed with confiderable lofs; at which time the english troops and indians leaped the breaftwork purfued the enemy, flaughtered numbers, and took feveral prifoners ; among whom, was the baron Dieskau, the french commander in chief, which made the victory on the fide of the english complete; the pursuit of the enemy ended about feven o'clock. The lofs of the french was upwards of 1000 men; that of the conquerors did not exceed 130 killed and 60 wounded; col. Titcomb was killed, major Johnfon and major Nichols were wounded. Our greateft lofs was in the detachment under col. Williams, who was killed, together with major Afhley, captains Ingerfal, Puter, Ferral, Stoddert, M'Gimes and Steevens, all indian officers, with 40 indians and old Hendrik, the famous indian fachem.

It is to be remarked, that in this engagement, the indians (fome of the Mohawks excepted) retired from the camp, and did not join the army till after the battle; this fhows us very plain, that our good friends the indians were ready to join the conqueror, whether french or english; which I wonder at the more, as Mr. Johnfon was allowed to have an universal influence over those with him in this expedition. But the general's conduct was impeached of a much greater miltake than that he was guilty of, in putting too much confidence in his indians, his not following the blow he had gained; it was objected against him, that had he purfued the enemy clofe, with fpirit, he might with little difficulty have made himfelf mafter of Crown Point, the chief object of the expedition. It must be allowed that if we confider feveral expreffions in the general's letter to the governors of the colonies, we shall find reason to believe, that he did not make the most of his advantage; and his feeming to be fo much afraid of a "more formidable attack," makes us think that he had conceived much too great notions notions of the enemy he had conquered : as to his own perfonal bravery, I never heard the leaft flur thrown upon that.

Governor Shirley, as I mentioned before, arrived at New York, from Ofwego, the 2d of december; having, before he left Albany, wrote circular letters to the feveral governors upon the continent, as far weftward as Virginia, fummoning them to meet him there, in order to form a council of war, confifting (purfuant to one of his majefty's inftructions to him) of fuch of the governors upon the continent, and field officers of his majefty's troops, as could attend it. The council met the 12th, and although the invitation was general, it confifted but of few members.

Mr. Shirley opened the conference, by laying be-fore them, his majefty's inftructions to general Braddock ; and then delivered his own fentiments to the board; who declared their opinion in favour of Mr. Shirley's fchemes; and, in particular, that it was most effentially necessary, at all events, to fecure the navigation of the lake Ontario; but they were of opinion, that 6000 troops should be employed in the expedition against the french forts upon that lake, and 10,000 in that against Crown Point; and as to the proposed attempt against fort du Quesne, and ope-rations upon the river Chaudiere, they were of opinion, they should be carried into execution, provided it could be done without interfering with the two principal expeditions : and after confidering the points proposed to them by Mr. Shirley, they declared it to be their unanimous opinion that, an additional number of regular troops to those his majesty then had upon the continent, would be neceffary for effectually recovering and fecuring his just rights there. The refult of the council was, that Mr. Shirley, as he had received intelligence, that the french were building veffels of force at Frontenac, ordered a fnow, a brigantine, and a floop to be built, as foon as poffible at Ofwego; and and determined to make preparations for carrying into execution the before-mentioned plan of operations in the enfuing year, as far as the forces he then fhould have, would permit him.

Such were the refolutions taken in this council of war; who adopted Mr. Shirley's opinion in every thing, and indeed with great reafon; for certainly the plan of operations which he framed and laid before them, was drawn up in a mafterly manner, and fhowed that the author of it was perfectly well acquainted with his bufinefs, in the theory at leaft; what he was in the practice of it, I fhall have further occafion to mention hereafter.

But although the debates and refolutions in the cabinet were guided by wifdom, prudence, and forefight; the operations in the field, afforded but a melancholy prospect. How fruitless was the campaign of 1755! It was the misfortune of the english colonies to defpife their enemy : they knew their own country was populous, fertile, and great part of it well cultivated; on the contrary, Canada was barren, and uncultivated, and had not a fiftieth part of the inhabitants, which were in their own; the parallel fo advantageous to the english, proved almost their ruin; exalted with these notions of their superiority, they did not confider, that the french knowing their own inferiority, were refolved to make up, by the most unremitting diligence, what they wanted in point of numbers; for fome time the event answered their expectations; for furely no country was ever in a more pitiful condition, than the english colonies were reduced to, by means of the incursions of the french and their indians; the defenceless country was one continued fcene of all the horrors of war, rendered more terrible by the barbarous manner with which the indians make it. General Braddock, in whom their greatest hopes were centered, was defeated, and their enemies pouring in upon them, like an irrefiftible torrent, without any thing to oppofe them:

them: and in full poffeffion of all their formidable encroachments : all the english could boast of having done (to the fouth of Nova Scotia) was the building two paltry forts at Ofwego, and they not comeplete; and the fine fpeeches made in the council of war by the commander in chief: I am speaking of what concerned general Shirley; Mr. Johnfon indeed, gained a victory over the enemy, which had very great confequences; but as to Mr. Shirley's expedition to Ofwego, in which he fpent fo much time and money; I cannot reflect on it without regret. The manner in which the year 1755 ended, will be remembered in the annals of America, with forrow. The weak efforts made by the english nation to recover its just rights, which were fo fcandaloufly trampled upon by the french; will be a lafting difgrace to the politics of a people who make fo confiderable a figure in Europe, and who were fo able to protect their fellow fubjects in America. Indeed, with the bleffing of God, they have fince had better fuccefs in fo just a caufe; and have exulted, with reafon, in their turn; but under different generals, directed by very different councils. It will be my business to shew this hereafter; in the mean time, it is neceffary to take a view of the transactions in Europe; which shall be the fubject of the next chapter.

TEW years ever opened the dawn of their con-tents, at a more critical time than the year 1756. The difputes between the kingdoms of England and France, was come to fuch a height, that a war was inevitable: although neither party chofe yet to declare themfelves openly, ftill it was very plain from the general circumftances of the two nations, that matters were come to fuch a crifis, as to be impoffible to be healed. In America the war was become open and avowed, and it was expected to be the fame in Europe every day; for all intercourfe was cut off. Many difcerning people were miftaken in their conjectures, when they thought they perceived a reconciliation between the two nations, near at hand, fo far from it, that it was never further off. The miniftry, who at this time prefided in the conncils of England, would have been glad to have procured a lafting peace between the french and english, could they have been able to do it without forfeiting their own honour, or what perhaps they effeemed a greater lofs, their places. Thefe gentlemen forefaw, very plain, that as foon as an irruption took place between the two courts, their power would fall to pieces, by reafon of the multitude of factions and parties, which always fpring up in the english court court at the beginning of a war : urged by thefe reafons, they would have patched up matters with the french court, more fpeedily than the intereft of their country required; if the nation had not had a truer fenfe of the injuries received from the french. In this ticklifh fituation, was the court of England, at the beginning of the year 1756.

This year, fo remarkable in the annals of Britain, was ufhered in by the ftrange letter *, wrote by Monf. Rouillé, minifter and fecretary of ftate to the king of France, to Mr. Fox, fecretary of ftate to the king of England; it contained a pompous juftification of the french king's conduct, and complaining of the hostilities committed by the english; turning the whole blame of the war on the king of England. Mr. Fox's answer was wrote with the fame defign, complaining of the conduct of the french court.

Before I make any obfervations on the french memorial, I fhall juft add a remark on Mr. F—'s mamagement of this affair, fo far as it concerned his anfwer; and that is, the fcandalous manner in which the nation was difgraced by the beggarly french, in which Mr. F—'s letter was composed, and as such was printed in the Paris gazette. I leave the reader to judge, whether it is becoming the honour of the englifh nation, for its first minister to talk to a foreign court in any other language but that of his own nation.

Never did the chicanary of the court of France appear more glaringly, than in the above memorial; nothing is more fufceptable of the moft mathematical demoftration, than that Britain was, in her own moft juft defence, forced into this war with France: ftabbed at her vitals in America, fhe was either obliged to acquiefce fupinely in the french manifold invalions there; or to put a ftop to them by repelling the aggreffion with a commencement of hoftilities. An immediate declaration of war would, perhaps, have been more confonant to the eftablifhed forms of practice; but fince the french themfelves had not paid any regard to them, in their own procedure; they could, at leaft, with the worfe grace complain of our having followed the bad example they had fet us; which was not the lefs real, for its being the lefs manifeft to the reft of Europe.

But to clear up beyond doubt the falfity of the allegations contained in this memorial, we need but conlider the following matters of fact, relating to it. It should be remembered, that in january 1755, the french ambaffador returned to London, and made great protestations of his court's fincere defire, finally and fpeedily to adjust all disputes between the two crowns concerning America : and notwithftanding the extraordinary preparations which were at that time making in the ports of France, her ambaffador propofed, " That before the ground and circum-" stances of the quarrel should be enquired into, " politive orders flould be immediately fent to our " refpective governors, forbidding them to under-" take any new enterprife, or proceed to any act of " hoftility; and enjoining them, on the contrary, to " put things without delay, with regard to the lands " on the Ohio, on the fame footing that they were; " or ought to have been before the war; and that " the refpective claims fhould be amicably referred " to the commiffioners at Paris, that the two courts " might terminate the difference by a fpeedy accom-" medation."

The britifh court immediately declared its readiness to confent to the proposed ceffation of hostilities, and that all the points in dispute might be discussed and terminated by the ministers of the two crowns; but on this condition, that all the possession in America should be previously put on the foot of the treaty of Utrecht, confirmed by that of Aix la Chapelle; therefore, the king of England proposed, "That the "possession of the land on the Ohio should be re-"flored to the footing it was on at the conclus "fion " tion of the faid treaty, which was renewed by that of Aix la Chapelle; and moreover, that the other " poffeffions in north America fhould be reftored to " the fame condition in which they actually were, at " the figning of the faid treaty of Utrecht, and 66 agreeable to ceffions and flipulations therein ex-" preffed: and then the method of informing the " refpective governors, and forbidding them to un-" dertake any new enterprise, or act of hostility, " might be treated of; and the claims of both par-" ties referved, to be fpeedily and finally adjusted, " in an amicable manner between the two courts." That is to fay, that France should repay the injury done by open force, before the parties should enter into treaty about the claim of right, after which the possessions of both parties might be fettled on the foot of a definitive agreement.

The reafon for the french court's proceeding in this manner, is very palpable : nothing would have ferved their turn fo well, as referring the cafe to be agreed on by the commiffioners at Paris; and the reafon is very plain; no fooner fhould we have ordered our american governors to defift from any acts of hoftility, and referred our caufe to negociation; but the french would have fet about ftrengthening themfelves in America, by fupplies from Europe, in fuch a manner, that they would at this day have been fuperior to the englifh in that country; and not only have fecured to themfelves, the encroachments they had already made, but would in all probability have conquered all the back fettlements belonging to the englifh colonies; or, to ufe the words of a french writer, have " drove the englifh into the fea."

Negotiations at this period extended further than just between the two crowns of Great Britain and France; the two kings of England and Prussia, at this time, thought it necessfary for each other's welfare to enter into a negotiation for a treaty to keep all foreign troops from entering the empire; which were F fpeedily fpeedily brought to a conclution; for a treaty was figned between thefe two powers, on the 16th of january, this year : the reations given by the britifh miniftry for taking this measure, were chiefly centered in the defign, to keep the french from invading the electorate of Hanover; which it was very natural to expect they would really do, after they had threatened it in all the courts of Europe. The fubftance of this treaty was as follows:

I. That Great Britain with her allies, and Pruffia, fhall mutually affift each other, in endeavouring to keep all foreign troops from entering the empire.

II. That Great Britain fhall pay 20,000 l. as an indemnification for the captures of that merchandize, which was taken on board prufilan bottoms, and fold during the laft war, and in return, that Prufila fhall pay the Silefia loan.

The reader will perceive, that the most important article of this treaty is, that Great Britain and her allies, and Pruffia, fhall mutually affift each other in endeavouring to keep all foreign troops from enter-ing the empire. And here it is neceffary to recall to mind, the treaty concluded the laft year with Ruffia, by which, as I before shewed, the Russians were to act in Germany, agreeable to the directions of his britannic majefty. From this it appears, that thefe two treaties with Ruffia and Pruffia are, at leaft, feemingly contradictory to each other; for by the ruflian treaty, the ruffians are to march into Germany, for the purpofes of that treaty; and by the pruffian treaty, they are excluded from entering the empire, being foreign troops. I know to this, many specious political arguments are used by the friends of the english ministry, to perfuade the world, that thefe two treaties are not in the least opposite and contradictory to one another, being folely defigned for the protection of Hanover against the french; but I must confess, that in my humble opinion, nothing can be more feemingly inconfiftent; I fay feemingly, for for we know not what private reasons, (there certainly can be no public ones) might induce the english miniftry to have concluded this treaty. In fhort, this is one of those furprising turns in the political world, which aftonishes every one, as it leaves every one in the dark, and which nothing but time can make appear in its true light,

The fituation of affairs in Europe were at this time extremely critical; every day produced fome new reafons to believe, that a war was become inevitable between Great Britain and France; and it was much feared, that the quarrel between these two nations would involve the reft of Europe in the war; by reason of the open declarations, which France every where made of her intentions, to march an army into the electorate of Hanover; which it was thought would engage fome of the german princes in the quarrel, as foon as any french troops invaded the empire. In the North, matters did not bid fo fairly for war, as every thing was peaceable in those king-doms; but the scene of negotiations on the continent of Europe at this time, was the Hague; where the ministers of the two belligerant powers were using their utmost endeavours to procure an intereft in the republic, for their respective masters. It was then (the 13th of february) that col. York, the king of Great Britain's ambassador at the Hague, delivered to their high mightineffes an important me-morial, importing, "That although his mafter had convinced all Europe of his defire to maintain the general peace that had lately fubfifted; yet he found himfelf threatened with a war being kindled in his own dominions. That France was at that time making immense preparations of all kinds, particularly on the northern coafts, which were evidently defigned against Great Britain; and which the french ministers at the feveral courts of Europe had confirmed, by their declarations. That thefe motives had obliged the king to demand the 6000 men, to be fent over to his affistance. F 2 affiftance, which the republic was bound to do by treaty; and that the neceffary fhipping for their embarkation, would be got ready immediately."

This memorial gave a clear and juft account of the great preparations which France was at this time making on all fides. It is true, their defination was not then known; but, they were certainly very alarming to the court of Great Britain; there were at leaft, 40,000 men affembled in Flanders, under the command of two marshals of France, these troops were posted there, for two reasons; the first to be ready to annoy England, and fecondly to awe the dutch ; for the french ambaffador at the Hague, threatened the ftates general with an invalion, if they complied with the demands of Great Britain, in relation to the 6000 men. All the ports of France at this time refounded with the noife of preparations, which tended to invade Great Britain : troops from all the inland parts of the kingdom were continually, fwarming towards the northern coast. Indeed, in this cafe, it is natural for the reader to alk how it came about, that England was at this time fo deftitute of national force; for really it does not appear, but that the kingdom was not fo very weak, as to make it neceffary to call in the affiftance of the troops, which Holland was by treaty obliged to furnish; but still as the dutch were bound to fuccour us, it was judged a neceffary measure to demand the supply of 6000 men, as we might by that means perceive how they ftood affected towards the english.

The truth was, these phlegmetic friends were so much under the influence of France, that upon the french ambassiador's presenting a memorial to the states general, on account of the demand made by England, they refused to send the succours, although they were bound so to do by treaty; nor will they furprise us much, when we consider the quantity of french gold that was made use of to procure this resolve, which reflected so much dishonour on the states of Holland; but France is never without her penfioners at the Hague.

Matters were become fo warlike between the two nations, that many in England really believed, that the french intended to invade us; it is very plain that the ministry did not think themselves perfectly fecure, from a meffage which his majefty fent to the parliament, in which he acquainted them, that he had received fure advice of a defign formed by France to invade his kingdoms, which his majefty had great reason to believe true, from the immense preparations making on the coaft of France : that his majefty had, with their advice, augmented his forces, and made a requilition of a body of heffian troops, to be brought over, as they are obliged to be by treaty: that his majefty doubted not, but he fhould be fupported on this occafion by his parliament, in opposition to any fuch daring attempts.

Never did any parliament shew more unanimity than was difcovered on reading this meffage; it was agreed, without any opposition, that an address of thanks should be prefented to his majesty, affuring him of their inviolable attachment to his perfon and government, against the hostile attempts of France.

In return for fo much loyalty and affection, his majefty answered, " That he thanked them for their " repeated affurances of their unalterable zeal, " duty, and affection to him, on this occasion, and " has the utmost confidence in their vigorous fup-" port."

As I have feveral times mentioned the alarm that prevailed in England, to fo great a degree, of a french invalion, it will be neceffary to acquaint the reader, that the parliament was now fo much of opinion that the nation was really in danger, as to addrefs the king, to bring over a body of the hanoverian troops, for the protection of the kingdom, against the defigns of France; to which his majesty returned the following anfwer. " I am always very " glad

" glad to do any thing that is agreeable to my parli-" ament, and for the benefit and fecurity of my peo-" ple'; and as both houses defire that a body of my " german troops should be brought over hither, to " affist in defence of this kingdom, in the prefent " critical conjucture, I will give immediate orders " for that purpose."

I cannot pass over an affair which made fo great a noife half Europe over, as the address of the british parliament. It is difficult to fay, what could poffefs the nation with fuch an universal dread of an invafion, as at this time ran through all degrees of people, from the highest to the lowest. Every true briton, that loves his country and effeems its honour, will look back upon it with deteftation. Will it not be recorded to the difhonour of the british nation, that she was forced to ask the affistance of the electorate of Hanover, to defend herfelf againft'an imaginary danger; for it is well known, that all the mighty preparations of France, were, at this time, deftined for a different expedition, which afterwards fully appeared : and this difgrace is yet more fully difplayed, when we confider, that at this time, very few english troops were absent in the East or West-Indies, or the american colonies. Would it not have been more honourable in the nation, to have raifed an army of the natives to defend their own country, than to call in the affiftance of foreigners; and after all the noife and buffle that was made in trumpeting out the danger the nation was in, when it was pretended that a concatination of events foretold this danger, that after all, it should turn out a mere stratagem of the french court, to deceive the english miniftry.

As I am now mentioning the affairs of the parliament this feffion, for the take of perfpicuity, I will continue my account till the end of the feffion, first taking notice of the meffage which his majefty fent to both houses, the 11th of may, fignifying, "That " his

" his majefty being defirous to be prepared against " all attempts and defigns whatfoever, that may be " formed by his enemies in the prefent critical con-" juncture, and confidering that fudden emergencies " may arife, which may be of the utmost import-" ance, and be attended with the most pernicious " confequences, if proper means should not be im-" mediately applied, to prevent or defeat them; his " majefty hoped, that he shall be enabled by his par-" liament, to concert and take fuch measures as may " be neceffary to difappoint or defeat any enterprifes " or defigns of his enemies, and as the exigency of " affairs may require." To this meffage both houfes prefented the most loyal and dutiful address; but what was much more conducive to the defign in his majefty's meffage, was the famous refolution of the houfe of commons, in confequence of this meffage, whereby they granted his majefty one million upon account; a generofity hardly to be paralleled; and this vote was in fact the most important piece of business performed this session of parliament. On the 27th of may, his majefty made a speech to both houses of parliament; the following is them oft material paffage :

" The injuries and hoftilities, which have been for fome time committed by the french against my dominions and fubjects, are now followed by the actual invation of the island of Minorca; which stands guarantied to me by all the great powers of Europe, and in particular by the french king. I have therefore found myfelf obliged, in vindication of the honour of my crown, and of the rights of my people, to de-clare war in form against France. I rely on the divine protection, and the vigorous affistance of my faithful subjects, in so just a cause."

After this fpeech, the lord chancellor fignified his majefty's pleasure, that both houses should feverally F 4 adjourn adjourn themfelves until june the 18th, which they accordingly did; and on that day they again adjourned themfelves to july the 15th; but on the 7th they were prorogued to august the 17th, which put an end to the fession.

Thus ended this feffion of parliament, that had been even more generous than any former ones, of late years at leaft. I have given the reader this abftract of parliamentary affairs together for the fake of brevity; as to the affair of Minorca, which his majefty mentions in his fpeech, I muft defire the reader's patience for a little while, before I can give an account of an affair equally inglorious to my country and difagreeable to me. I fhould remember to obferve, that during this feffion, that is on the 3d and 8th of may, the following votes were paffed:

That there be granted to his majefty, for the charge of 6544 foot, with the general officers and train of artillery, of the heffian troops, from february 23d, 1756, to december 24 following, together with the fubfidy purfuant to treaty, 1633571.9 s. 9d.

fublidy purfuant to treaty, 1633571. 9 s. 9d.
May 8. For the charge of 8605 foot, with the general officers, train of artillery and hofpital, of the Hanover troops, from may 11, 1756, to december 24 following, 1214471. 2 s. 6 d.

In confequence of thefe votes, we find that on the 13th of may, two men of war, with 45 transports, having 8000 heffian foot and 900 horfe on board, anchored in Margate road, and on the 15th landed at Southampton; with a large train of artillery. They were divided into eight regiments, ten companies in a regiment, eighty men in a company; each regiment having ninety engineers, eighty-feven horfes, and eight field pieces. The principal officers were, the lieutenant general, count Henburg, knight of the teutonic order, who was the first in command; lieutenant general baron Diebe, knight of the fame order, who commanded the artillery; and baron Furflenburg, brother to the count, major generals. The troops troops made a fine appearance, being generally ftreight, tall, and flender; their uniform was blue, turned up with red, and laced with white, in imitation of filver. The officers, who were all well made, were richly dreffed in blue, laced with gold, with that on their hats remarkably broad. They were quartered in the neighbouring towns, where they obferved the ftricteft difcipline.

On the 21ft, the hanoverians landed at Chatham, to the number of 10,000 men, and began their march in two divisions; the first for Maidstone, and the other for Canterbury. They were received with great civility, and behaved with remarkable regularity. At Maidstone, fome little disturbance happened, and complaint being made to the commanding officer, "Point me out the man," faid he, " and prove him " the aggreffor, and you shall fee him hanged im-" mediately;" but this was thought too fevere, and no particular man was pitched upon. These hanoverians, and the hessian troops were thought at that time to be some of the best foldiers in Europe; and we have fince found them to behave with the greatest honour and bravery.

Amidft all these preparations for war, which had really brought on an open rupture between the two nations; all Europe was surprised that neither of the belligerent powers had yet declared war in due form. It was a matter of aftonishment to the generality of mankind, to see two powerful kingdoms at open war, without any public universal manifesto concerning the reasons for their attacking one another. At last however, his britannic majesty thought it neceffary to observe this usual decorum, and accordingly declared war against France on the 17th of may; and that of France against England was on the 9th of june.

Such were the ftate of affairs between the two nations in Europe, at the time war was declared. In the Eaft-Indies, matters went on much fafter, and more more prosperously to the english; it was the be-ginning of this year, that the famous pyrate Tu-lagee Angria was conquered, and rooted out of his ftrong hold at fort Geriah, by the english forces under colonel Clive. But before we can give any account of the action itself, it will be neceffary to fay fomething concerning fo extraordinary a man, as him we are fpeaking off. It feems that fome years ago, the anceftors of Angria were viceroys to the great moghul, and governed a fine country on the Caromandel coaft, where they lived with great fplendor and opulence; and by means of the great riches they amaffed, were enabled for a confiderable time to throw off their allegiance to the moghul; but were afterwards reduced to obedience by a fovereign prince, whofe dominions lay to the fouth of those of Angria, who was called the fouth raja; this prince imposed a tribute on Angria, which was regularly paid for fome years, till Tulagee Angria refused, about the year 1754; at which, the fouth raja was highly provoked; and to chaftife the infolence of Angria's behaviour, marched an army into his country, and blocked up all his towns; the most confiderable of which, were the ports of Zivanchi, Antiguria, Dabul, and fouth Rook. And to enable himfelf the more readily to deftroy his enemy, he fent to the englifh at Bombay, to defire them to affift him, in his conqueft of Angria.

With this requeft the englifh complied; and admiral Watfon commanding at that time in the Eaft-Indies, he affifted at a council of war held at Bombay on the 6th of february. The land forces were under the command of colonel Clive. The admiral attacked Geriah on the 12th, and it furrendered on the 13th.

In the fort were found 250 iron and brafs cannon of all fizes, and a prodigious quantity of ammunition of all forts, provifions, rich goods, and many other commodities. The garrifon confifted of about 300 men, though though there were above 2000 in the fort. In filver rupees were found about 100,000 l. and in other effects near 30,000l. The admiral left about 300 of the Eaft-India company's troops, as many feapoys, and 3 or 4 of the company's armed veffels in the harbour, for the defence of the place, as it was judged to be extremely well fituated for the intereft of the company, and very tenable.

In this fuccelsful manner ended the expedition againft Angria; which was of infinite fervice to the Eaft-India company's affairs, as it rooted a notorious pyrate from his fortrefs of the greateft confequence to him. It is thought that col. Clive got above 100,000 l. by this affair, and the admirals and other officers were equally fortunate in this important conqueft. The french in this part of the world looked with a very envious eye upon this fuccefs; as no doubt they did not care to fee the exaltation of a company, who were the enemies of that nation, and who were every day excelling them in their trade. This was the firft warlike expedition of confequence in the Eaft-Indies this war.

TT has with great reafon been made a matter of wonder, that the french monarchy has been able for near a century past, to produce at the same time fuch powerful armaments both by fea and land. No other nation in Europe has been fo powerful at fea and land at the fame time as France, except England; and the naval ftrength of England has never ftood fuch fevere trials as that of France. The power and refources of a nation are best discovered by its loss; every war that has happened between France and England, fince Charles the first's time, has never failed to be more ruinous to the former than the latter; and many times has been entirely deftroyed, more particularly at the end of the war of 1740. The arms of Great Britain were not fo fuccefsful the beginning of this war, neither by fea nor land, as the greatness of our preparations might have inspired us with the hopes of. At the beginning of this year particularly, all the ports of England refounded with the noise of naval armaments; the rigorous method of preffing men to man the fleet was now adopted with the utmost feverity, and many thousands of able hands were picked up throughout all England; infomuch, that most part of the month of january we we had a noble fleet riding at Spithead, befides fe-veral ftrong fquadrons at fea, to protect our own trade and annoy that of the enemy. The naval affairs, though they are always of importance, and ne-ceffary to be known, towards a perfect understanding of the prefent quarrel between the two nations, yet, during the beginning of 1756, we meet with few fquadrons, that failed from british ports, whose motions are any ways instructive to the reader; the most material one at this time was, fir Edward Hawke's expedition. The lords of the admiralty having been informed that fix french men of war had failed from Breft, ordered admiral Hawke on the 27th of february to put to fea immediately, but he was detained till the 12th of march by contrary winds, on which day he failed with the East-India ships, to convoy them 150 leagues weftward of Ushant. He was then ordered to return to cape Ortegal, and cruife in the bay, to prevent the french fhips putting to fea from Breft or Rochfort, or to intercept the aforefaid french squadron. This squadron consisted of eleven ships of the line and one frigate.

Sir Edward Hawke, according to his inftructions cruifed till the beginning of may, for the french, but unluckily was not able to effect any thing. He returned to Spithead the 8th with part of his fquadron.

During the first part of this year, the french had by all the arts and means in their power endeavoured to perfuade the english, that they really intended to invade them. It is even to this day a doubt, whether the french, at the time we are speaking of, had ever really determined to attempt an invasion. The preparations they made were certainly confiderable; and it was confidently talked of, at most of the courts of Europe, that England was in great danger. It was at this time the common topic of conversation; those who were most perfuaded of the reality of the french designing to invade us, faid even in a positive manner, manner, (and the advices that were received from the Hague on this head corroborated exactly with that opinion) that the plan for invading Great Britain was proposed by M. de Belleisle, who offered to un-dertake the execution thereof; but that he had been violently opposed by M. de Seychelles. 'The marshal's plan, was not to attack any of the powers on the continent, and particularly to leave Hanover quiet; but at the fame time to affemble three large armies on the frontiers of Alface, Flanders, and Languedoc, in order to keep the powers in Europe in awe and fuspence. Then ferioufly to attempt an invasion of Great Britain or Ireland, or both, by getting together as many veffels as poffible in different ports, with every thing necessary for an embarkation. And he further advised the french king, not to fend out any large fquadrons of men of war, but only fome light cruifers to cover the arrival and departure of their transports; to give notice of the motions of the englifh, and to carry fupplies to their colonies; however, at Breft he thought it neceffary to have a very large fleet ready to give umbrage to the english, and to ferve as occasion should require. This was Belleisle's plan, and although we find that it, in general was re-jected, ftill fome motions of the french looked as if they had adopted part of it; the marshal, and the prince de Soubile, foon after began their circuit at Dunkirk, and from thence went from port to port quite to Breft, forwarding the preparations that were making all along the coaft, feemingly to invade us.

Whether they really intended to put their threats in execution or not is unknown, yet they certainly gained one point of importance by these means; they deceived the attention of the british ministry, and were thereby enabled to render successful their defigns against another quarter; besides which, the expence their preparations put the english to, in counteracting ing their defigns, was to be fure of great consequence.

It was on account of these preparations on the coast of France, that, we were always obliged to keep a squadron of men of war in the Downs; and for the greater security, commodore Keppel sailed on the 7th of april. to cruife off Cherburgh with a squadron of five ships, to burn the flat bottomed boats, which the french were building, and to pick up any straggling transports that might fall in their way, the latter of these ends was pretty well answered by the commodore's fucces.

The naval ftrength which the englifh had at this time in America, was very fmall, in proportion to the great importance of that ftation : and the miniftry in England was much blamed for not keeping regularly and conftantly a ftrong fquadron of men of men of war in that part of the world, to refift and annoy the operations of the french. At laft, however, admiral Holbourn failed from Plymouth, with feven fail of fhips to convoy the transports, containing the reinforcement of troops that were juftly thought neceffary to repair the bad ftate of the britifh empire there, by checking the progress of France.

But in Europe, the naval equipments were more confiderable; admiral Hawke, as I have before mentioned, was before Breft with a confiderable fleet, to relieve which, admiral Bofcawen failed from Spithead with twelve fail.

So formidable an armament failing to the coaft of France, would naturally lead us to expect fome attempt of importance. But this was not the cafe, the french minifity, by alarming us with the fear of an invafion, put us to fuch an immenfe expence to keep their fleets in harbour, and even this, we were feldom able to perform, for the french feveral times flipt through the englifh fleets lying before Breft. The principal reafon that has been given by the britifh miniftry for putting the nation to fo great an expence merely merely to coop our enemies up in their harbours, was, to hinder them at this time from fending fuccours to America. Admiral Hawke, as I faid before, foon after arrived at Spithead with a fmall fquadron.

Several other fquadrons were fitted out, and failed as cruifers, convoys, or fquadrons of obfervation; but as their defination was not fo important, I have for brevity fake omitted mentioning them. But I muft now begin to take notice of a much more important affair, and which will require a more minute enquiry into the first appearances of the defigns of our enemies: I mean the conquest of Minorca by the french.

It will be here neceffary for me to trace out fome advices which the miniftry in England received concerning the preparations of the french in the port of Toulon; for from thence we must afterwards conclude, whether they had reason to believe that the french intended an invasion of the island of Minorca, or whether they only meant it as a feint to draw the attention of the english from the channel, that they might thereby be able to effect their grand design againft Great Britain itself.

So early as the month of auguft 1755, the miniftry in England had intelligence, from different parts, of the armament at Toulon. They were expressly informed, that orders had been fent thither, to equip with expedition, all the new fhips, and to get the old ones also in a condition for fervice: that these orders were then purfued with great diligence, and that they were to take on board feveral companies of land forces, befides marines. That fince the arrival of two expresses at Toulon, which had caused the holding of two extraordinary councils, attended by the principal officers of the marine, the hands which were at work in fitting out nine fhips there, were doubled, and fix other fhips of the line put in commission, and ordered dered to be equipped with the former nine, fo as to be able to put all the 15 fail to fea before the 18th or 20th of august, and to be victualed only for three months. This intelligence was in part confirmed by the earl of Briftol, the english ambassador at Turin, who informed the ministry, that all the master builders were commanded to repair immediately from the ports of Provence, &c. to Toulon; and that a body of 20,000 french troops were prepared to form a camp at Valence in Dauphine : thefe advices were exactly confirmed by conful Birtles, from Nice. But conful Banks, in his letters from Carthagena, dated the 20th and 27th of au-gust, is still more explicit; "Masters of french veffels from Toulon," fays he, " report, that there are in that port 26 men of war of the line, viz. 18 new fhips built fince the peace, and 8 old ones, which are all fitting for fea; alfo 12 frigates, and a great many fmaller veffels, which are in like manner fitting out; besides fix ships of the line on the stocks; fome of which are ready for launching: that he had received intelligence of 180 battalions of foldiers marching into Rouffillon with great diligence; and that these troops were defigned against Minorca, to be transported thither in merchant ships, now at Marfeilles, and to be convoyed by all the men of war in the port of Toulon."

These advices were constantly repeated : not a month paffed, without innumerable affurances being received at the fecretary of state's office, from lord Bristol, general Blakeney, general Fowke, fir Ben. Keene, and, in fhort, all the confuls in the Mediterranean, concerning the great preparations which were carrying on at Toulon. Sir Ben. Keene wrote to Mr. Fox, particularly affuring him, " that the french defigned to invade Minorca." Nothing could be more circum-ftantial than the repeated advices which the english ministry received of the defigns of France. But let G us fee what were their measures to oppose fuch formidable preparations.

There were at this time in the Mediterranean a small fquadron of three fhips of the line, and five frigates, under commodore Edgecombe; but no fleet was ordered to fail from England, for the protection of Minorca, till the 8th of march; when a fquadron was directed to be under the command of vice-admiral Byng, and to be ready by the 11th. It is impossible to account for the negligence of the english ministry, in not thinking of this valuable island before fo late a date : it is also as unaccountable, that they should not believe any of the advices, which their correspondents all over Europe gave them, of the reality of the defign of the french, in making such immense and early preparations at Toulon. Had they believed the truth of these advices, they certainly would have taken care that their administration should not be tarnished with the loss of fo important a fortress as that of St. Philip's : it is very well known, how lightly they treated the notion of an invafion of the ifland of Minorca; they did not think it poffible, that the french could procure failors fufficient to man their fleet; if they had fuppofed it possible for the french to put fo ftrong a fleet to fea from Toulon, as they afterwards fatally found to be the cafe, why did they not fend admiral Ofborn's fquadron, of 13 thips of the line, and one frigate, into the Mediterranean, who failed the 30th of january (and returned the 16th of february) to convoy a fleet of merchantmen. By fending this fquadron into the Mediterranean fo early, the french would naturally have been deterred from attempting the invalion; their fuccels in which expedition, entirely depended on the negligence of their enemies.

At last however, they exerted themselves so far, as to fend a fleet under admiral Byng to the Mediterranean, nean, confifting of ten fhips of the line *, which failed the 7th of april. However, in France more expedition was ufed.

However, in France more expedition was ufed. The marshal duke de Richelieu was already fet out from Paris for Toulon, with the officers who were to ferve under him, and arrived there the 25th of march, finding every thing in great readines. The fleet + failed the 12th of april, confisting of 13 fail of the line and 7 frigates.

The troops on board it, including a detachment of marines, in every fhip of war, amounted to about 16,000 men, in 25 battalions, embarked in 200 tranfports : M. de Richelieu, his fon, and his fon-in-law; M. de Maillebois, M. du Mefnil, M. de Lannion, the prince de Beauveau, the prince de Wirtemberg, and M. de Caufons, embarked on board the Foudroyant. The troops were all in merchant fhips; the grenadiers alone were in the men of war. The fleet and convoy contained at a moderate computation, near 30,000 fouls, including about 600 women; a prodigious quantity of provisions of every kind, above 800 oxen, and 3000 fheep, 100 horfes, and as many mules.

The report of these immense preparations, which threatened to overwhelm the little island of Minorca, without a blow, did not in the least terrify the brave commander of the english troops in the fortress of St. Philip: no fooner did the information of the defigns of the french reach general Blakeney, but he disposed all things for a brave and vigorous refistance; he prepared 40,000 fascines, and demolished all the triffing buildings which obstructed the open command of his cannon. The french landed at Cieutadella the 18th of april, from whence part of a regiment retired, evacuating the place to the enemy r Forty men, who belonged to the regiments at Gibraltar, and all the marines which were on board. the men of war, then in the harbour, were commanded into the garrifon, as a reinforcement; and the british fqudron, fix in number, failed out; capt. Scroop having first, with 140 of his men, joined the garrifon, and fent his ship, the Defiance, to fea, under the command of the first lieutenant.

I cannot omit taking notice of a patriot-like action performed by capt. Cunningham, a fcotch gentleman, who being fecond engineer of St. Philips, when Mr. Armftrong left it, he was thereupon appointed by general Blakeney to fucceed him, pro tempore, till a commission for that purpose should arrive from England. land, of which no doubt was made; but being fu-perfeeded, he begged Mr. Blakeney's leave to retire to his regiment. The general could not refufe fo reafonable a requeft, and Mr. Cunningham embarked for Nice, together with two children and his lady; who was there brought to bed; when Mr. Cunning-ham, hearing of the french defigns againft Minorca, and recollecting that the platforms of the batteries in fort St. Philip's were in fuch a ruinous condition, that they could not fland any hot fervice, inftantly laid out all the money he was mafter of, about 1600l. in purchasing timber fit for repairing them, hired a a vessel, put it on board, and failed directly with it himfelf for Port Mahon, leaving his lady and chil-dren at Nice. His arrival with fuch a fupply, in fuch a critical conjuncture, gave general Blakeney infinite pleafure. He told capt. Cunningham, that the fervice he had done his country, was fo confiderable, that he did not know how he could be fufficiently rewarded for it; that in the mean time, to flow his own fenfe of it, he would venture to take a very irregular ftep, by fuperfeeding the gentleman, who was fent to fucceed Mr. Armftrong, as fuperannuated and unfit for duty, and appointing him in his place, not only as a testimony of his approbation of what he had done, but to engage a man of his known abili-ties, to exert them still further in defence of the place. We shall find hereafter that capt. Cunningham very well deferved the confidence Mr. Blakeney reposed in him; but the public spirited action which I have just now given an account of, is of itself fo fhining a proof of the merits of this gentleman, that any fur-ther attempt to make them confpicuous is unneceffary. After many difficulties, the french being masters of all the forts in the island, except St. Philip's, and those adjoining to it, at length erected a battery of five 24 pounders, and five morters, over against St. Philip's, at cape Mola, near Sandy bay, on the fide G 3 opposite oppofite St. Philipet fort, which was ready to play the 5th of May, but was left mafked till others were ready alfo: this battery was well contrived, for by means of it the french commanded the harbour fo much, that it would be difficult to land any fuccour, but within fire of it. For feveral fucceeding days the enemy continued to erect batteries without intermiffion, and the befiged continued to defend themfelves with as great bravery. But I muft here return to the motions which Mr.

But I muft here return to the motions which Mr. Byng made, to relieve the diftreffed garrifon of St. Philip. I left the admiral proceeding to Gibraltar, where, after a tedious paffage, he arrived may the 2d; and directly demanded of lieut. gen. Fowke, the governor, according to his inftructions, a detachment from his garrifon, equal to a battalion; but this demand Mr. Fowke did not think proper to comply with (although he had orders for that purpofe from his majefty) till he had called a council of war, to demand the officers of his garrifon's opinion on that point.

^t The council meeting on the 4th of may, took into their confideration three letters * from lord Barrington, his majefty's fecretary at war, to the governor of Gibraltar, of the 21ft and 28th of march, and 1ft of april laft; as alfo an order from the lords of the admiralty to admiral Byng of the 31ft of march; and having confidered the flate of affairs in the Mediterranean, were of opinion, that the fending a detachment equal to a battalion would evidently weaken the garrifon of Gibraltar, and be no way effectual to the relief of Minorca; for which opinion they gave feveral reafons, relating to the difficulty of landing them at Minorca, and its weakening the garrifon of Gibraltar.

* Containing an order for general Fowke to make a detachment from his garrifon to be fent on board the fleet, equal to a battalion.

This opinion of the council of war we shall after-This opinion of the council of war we shall after-wards find made a very great noife. But of this we must defer speaking, till other transactions naturally lead us to it. Admiral Byng having been delayed by watering, failed the eighth from Gibraltar; he was afterwards accused of protracting this time longer than was needful. He arrived off Minorca the 19th, having been joined by his majefty's ship Phœnix, off Majorca, two days before. He dispatched the Phœ-nix, Chesterfield, and Dolphin a-head, to reconnoitre the harbour's mouth and cant Harvey to endeayour the harbour's mouth, and capt. Harvey to endeavour to land a letter for general Blakeney, to let him know the fleet was come to his affiftance; but the enemy's fleet appearing to fouth eaft, and the wind at the fame time coming ftrong off the land, obliged the admiral to call those fhips in, before they could get near enough the entrance of the harbour to make the necessary obfervations. There being little wind, about five the admiral formed his line, on which the enemy flood towards him in a regular line; but tacked about fe-ven, endeavouring to get the wind of the english fleet in the night; to avoid which, Mr. Byng tacked, in order to keep the weather gage, as well as to make fure of the land wind in the morning, being very hazy, and not above five leagues off cape Mola. At day-light, on the 20th, the two fleets were not within fight of each other. But foon after the enemy began to appear from the mast head, on which the english admiral called in the cruifers, and when they had joined him, tacked towards the enemy, and formed the line a-head, while the french were preparing to form their's to the leeward, having unfuccesfully endeavoured to weather their antago-nift; but as foon as he judged his rear to be the length of the enemy's van, they tacked all together, and ordered the Deptford to quit the line : the reafon which the english admiral gave for this step, was, that the english fleet might become exactly equal to the enemy's, which confisted of 12 ships of the line and 5 G 4 frigates.

frigates. At two, admiral Byng made the fignal to engage, on which, rear admiral Weft inftantly bore down on the enemy's fhips oppofed to his, and in going down received the fire of the french fhips againft him, three times, before he returned it, and then he foon obliged the two fhips fucceffively to fheer off, who were oppofed to him. The admiral bore down upon the fhip ftationed againft him, for fome little time, but the Intrepid having his foretop-maft fhot away, this, as the admiral gave out, obliged him and all his divifion to fall a-back; by this unaccountable management, the enemy's center was left unattacked, and the rear admiral's divifion quite uncovered; by which the french were enabled to bear down on admiral Weft, with the rear of their fleet, but they declined coming to a close engagement; and at laft the feveral fhips that were oppofed to and at laft the feveral fhips that were oppofed to Weft's division fheered off, and bent their endeavours to deftroy the rigging of the english fhips, at a distance, while the english admiral was lying a confiderable distance a-ftern of his rear. Next morning the two fleets were out of fight of each other, and Mr. Byng fent cruifers out to look for the Intrepide and Chefterfield, who had parted in the night from the fleet, and they returned and joined them the next day.

Such was the event of this famous engagement; it is equally furprifing, that Mr. Byng fhould fhew fuch great conduct and knowledge in management of the fleet before he threw out the fignal for battle; and that he fhould then feem to have loft all the merit he had gained by his former proceedings. It is allowed by thofe who are underftanding in fea affairs, that from the time he came in fight of the french fleet, till he hung out the fignal to engage, he managed his fleet with infinite dexterity and judgment, by which means he preferved the weather gage againft the enemy, who were not able, during the fucceeding engagement, to recover it. On the 24th of may, the admiral defired the attendance of the rear admiral, &c. &c. at a council of war held on board the Ramillies, to afk their opinions concerning the future operations of the fleet; at which were prefent the admirals, and all the captains of the fhips, and general officers of the land forces. The queftions which were debated and the council's refolutions are as follows:

I. Whether an attack upon the french fleet gives any prospect of relieving Minorca?

Anf. It would not.

II. Whether, if there was no french fleet cruifing off Minorca, the english fleet could raife the flege?

Anf. It could not.

III. Whether Gibraltar would not be in danger by any accident that may befall this fleet ?

Anf. It would be in danger.

IV. Whether an attack with our fleet in the prefent flate of it upon that of the french, will not endanger the fafety of Gibraltar, and expose the trade of the Mediterranean to great hazard?

Anf. That it would.

V. Whether it is not most for his majesty's fervice that the fleet should immediately proceed for Gibraltar?

Anf. That it should proceed for Gibraltar.

These resolutions were unanimously agreed to, and figned by all the members of the council. And to the aftonishment of all Europe, a fleet in every respect equal to that of the enemy, and, considering the superior courage and dexterity of the common failors, much superior to it, should fly from that of the enemy, leaving them all the consequences of a victory, riding triumphantly before Mahon, and gaining respect to the french flag throughout all the ports in the Mediterranean. Admiral Byng, on the 25th, set fail, and on the 19th of june arrived at Gibraltar: braltar. As I fhall have ample occafion to treat further of this affair hereafter, I fhall not determine on it at prefent. It is now time to return to the governor of St. Philip's, bravely defending himfelf againft the attacks of the french army.

For feveral days after the engagement of the 20th, the fire of both the befieged and befiegers continued very brifk; but the befieged had always the advantage, owing to the fuperior weight of their cannon, and fkill of the engineers *. During the fore part of the fiege, this was conftantly the cafe, but after the french general changed his plan of attack +, the garrifon fuffered

* The 13th in the morning, a very fingular accident happened. In the fort, fome guards parading in an under-ground gallery for fafety, where, in the center was a hole to let in light, and receiving wood from a neighbouring magazine; through this hole a 13 inch fhell made way, and burft among the guards without the leaft hurt to one man. During the whole fiege, the garrifon did not meet with fo providential an efcape. Another extraordinary accident happened in the like providential manner: a ten inch fhell falling into a barrack, the habitation of capt. Lind, in the caffle, and breaking every thing before it, forced its way through the floor, and burft without hurting any body, though a piece of the fhell even alighted on the bed where capt. Lind and his lady then lay.

+ The 27th M. de Richelieu, having altered his attack, had fome time before pitched upon this day for the general one, the evening before he called a council of war, at which were prefent all the general officers, to whom he imparted the whole project, which was unanimoufly approved : M. de Richelieu then proceeded to give them their refpective charges.

The plan of the whole attack being made known to the army, M. de Richelieu refolved that his own post should be in the center of the attacks on the left, and that the count de Maillebois, the the marquis du Mesnil, and the prince de Wirtemburg, should attend him to give the necessary orders for the support and success of the attacks.

It was agreed, that the fignal for beginning the attack, fhould be given by firing a cannon and four bombs, from the battery near the fignal houfe. All things being thus ordered, the artillery continued to batter the forts, till the 27th, at ten o'clock in the evening, when they all ceafed firing: and then the battery near the fignal houfe fired a cannon fhot, and threw four bombs into the fort; upon which, M. de Monty immediately marched againft Stregen and fered very feverely; and in a little time most of the principal works in the fortifications were ruined; under and Argyle, and fucceffively Meffrs. de Briqueville and de Sades, advanced to the attack of Kane, and the Queen's redoubt. Thefe attacks were furious, and the defence as brave. The befieged maintained their ground for a long while, and the firing on both fides did great execution; but at length fort Strugen was taken by affault; and Argyle and the Queen's redoubt by fcalade. Here the englifh fuftained a great lofs; for Mr. Jefferies, lieutenant colonel of the regiment of Effingham, who was coming to their affiftance, between Strugen and Argyle, with 100 men, arrived too late, the french being mafters of the forts; and whill the attempted to retire, was taken prifoner with 15 men. Mr. Jefferies was the principal acting man in the garrifon.

Thefe three forts being taken, with feveral pieces of cannon and mortars, the french made initantly a lodgement in that part, which was the principal attack; mean while the other attacks were carrying on with vigour. The prince de Beauveau, having at the fame time marched with his brigades against the Western and Caroline lunettes; he took possible of the covert way, and nailed up 12 pieces of cannon there; but as Kane's lunette was not taken, he could not make a lodgement here, but contented himself with cutting down the pallifadoes, destroying the gun carriages, and maintaining for fome time this attack, in order to favour the principal, which was making with great bravery.

The diverfion caufed by all thefe firings, and the combination of all thefe various attacks gave that on the left time to enfure fuccefs; and by break of day, the french being totally mafters of the Queen's redoubt, and the forts Strugen and Argyle, they pofted 400 men in the former, and 200 in the latter. M. de Richelieu, M. de Maillebois, M. du Mefnil, and the prince de Wirtemburg, were all this time, as they had concerted, in the center of the attacks on the left. Several of the mines were fprung under the glacis of the Anftruther, the Queen's redoubt, and Kane's lunette, and likewife one under the gorge of Argyle, while a confiderable party of the enemy were in it, moft of whom were deftroyed.

During thefe furious attacks; the brave governor and garrifon defended themfelves with all the intrepidity that was natural to englifhmen. The Weft, and Caroline's lunettes diflinguifhed themfelves particularly: with fuch exalted courage, and exerted bravery did this fatigued part of the garrifon maintain their ground, againft unequal numbers, each officer and foldier emulous of glory.

The 28th, by break of day, the befiegers beat a parley, on which immediately a ceffation of arms enfued ; this gave them an opportunity, which they took the advantage of, to fecure the lodgements der these disadvantages, it was amazing to find the brave and vigorous defence made by the english garrison; so that, although the french batteries began to play on the 5th of may, yet we find that the intrepidity of the brave general Blakeney, and the courageous garrison, the french were not able to make themselves masters of it before the 28th of june, on which day the garrison furrendered on honourable terms.

The next day, june the 29th, early in the morning, the duke de Fronsac, son to M. de Richelieu, was difpatched by him to carry to the king at Compeigne the news of the fuccefs of the laft attack against fort St. Philip's, but not the articles of capitulation, general Blakeney, not having at that time returned his anfwer to the alterations the marshal had made to the conditions he had propofed. M. de Fronfac was 6 days going from Minorca to Toulon, the winds having proved contrary almost the whole time. However, he came to Lyons the 7th of july, dined at the archbishop's, with the cardinal de Fenchion's, and set out immediately after for Paris, where he arrived the 9th, late in the evening, and early the 10th at Compeigne; where, after having acquainted the king with all the particulars of the furrender of fort St. Philip's, he was promoted by his majefty to the post of brigadier of his armies.

The articles of capitulation being figned, and the hoftages given, M. de Richelieu entered fort St. Philip the 29th of june at noon, and found 240 pieces of cannon fit for fervice, befides 40 that had been either ruined or nailed up during the attack; about ments they had made, by pouring in a confiderable number of troops, into a fubterranean paffage, that had been opened by a fhell, and which was not difcovered till the day cleared up. On the ceffation of arms, a capitulation took place, wherein almost all that was defired was granted, in confideration of the brave defence made by the gallant general Blakeney, and his intrepid garrifon. 70 mortars, 700,000 l. of gunpowder; 12,000 cannon balls, and 15,000 bombs. The garrifon confifted of 2963 men, about 2300 whereof were military. The englifh loft during the fiege only 400 men either killed or wounded, by reafon of the galleries and cafemattes cut in the rock and bomb proof, in which they were fheltered. So that the garrifon confifted, at the time of the french landing at Minorca, of about 800 labourers, &cc. and 2600 foldiers, making four regiments, viz. Rich's, Hufk's, Cornwallis's, and Effingham's; but their colonels were not there; 60 of the inferior officers were alfo wanting, though expected from day to day; infomuch, that the befieged were commanded by three lieut. colonels only, 23 captains, and a very few fubalterns.

The 8th of july, M. de Richelieu embarked on board the Foudroyant, with fome of the principal officers; and the fame day the whole french fleet hoifted fail, with feveral transports, carrying troops and artillery, and arrived fafe at Toulon the 16th; where as foon as M. de Richelieu landed, he was faluted fucceffively by the cannon of the whole fleet, and those of the forts. Some days after, all the troops arrived at Toulon and Marfeilles, except those that were left at Minorca, which consisted of 11 battallions, with a detachment of royal artillery, confifting of 100 men, and three engineers. The command of these troops was given to the count de Lannion, who was foon after made governor of the island.

The king of France, to reward the bravery flown by his troops in the fiege of Minorca, made feveral promotions, as a reward for the fervice of the officers at the fiege.

Such was the loss of the island of Minorca : a loss which certainly stains the annals of Britain, in an indelible manner. Had the island been conquered by the french, in spite of the united efforts of the english fleet and garrison; or had not the english possible a more a more powerful naval force than the french nation, the cafe would have been altered; but it is with equal grief and concern, that I am obliged to own and explain (if it wants explanation) how much the political character of Britain fuffered by this unfortunate lofs. The ministry in England were extremely blameable in not fending a ftronger fquadron fooner into the Mediterranean; had a stout fleet been sent thither to cruife off Toulon, before the french fleet failed, it would have been quite out of their power to transport an army to Minorca. For although they are able now and then to flip by a fuperior fleet lying before their harbour's mouth, yet, it would have been equally impossible to have effected that, and absurd to have endeavoured to do the fame, when they had 300 fail of transports to convoy. As to the case and merits of Mr. Byng, they are points fo very undetermined, and fo much difputed, that their confideration must be deferred till I come to speak of his trial *.

General William Blakeney, the brave defender of St. Philip's, was born at Mount Blakeney, in the county of Limerick in Ireland, anno 1672, the feat of his anceftors. He went early into the army in the beginning of the queen's war, and was an enfign with lord Cutts at the fiege of Venlo. He was long overlooked and neglected for want of friends, till at laft by the duke of Richmond's good offices, he was promoted to a regiment. He afterwards ferved against the spaniards at Carthagena, and commanded in Stirling caffle against the rebels, in the late rebellion, when they laid fiege to it, and wherein his courage and conduct gained him great applause. He was a long time lieutenant governor of Minorca; and confidering his great merit, and unblemished character, was always put into the most fevere and difagreeable employments. On his arrival in England, after his brave defence of St. Philip's, his majefty received him in the most gracious manner; and he was foon after created a baron of the kingdom of Ireland, by the name and title of lord Blakeney of Mount Blakeney; in that kingdom.

I shall conclude all what I have to fay on this fubject, with a few hints on what Minorca might have been, had the conduct of Britain been fuch; in regard to that island, as might have been expected from the politics of a nation famous for their love of arts and fciences, and the improvement and cultivation of all their extensive dominions. The natives of Minorca at present, are computed at about 28,000; but I leave the reader to judge, how much that number would have been encreased, had the whole island and every harbour and creek in it been declared a free port, as foon as ever they fell under the fubjection of England; without any fort of duties or fees, either upon importation or exportation, nor any tax upon goods of any kind, until they came into the retailer's or confumer's hands. Even then the taxes ought to have been as moderate, and collected in as eafy a manner as possible, in order to have made living in the island both cheap and convenient; for very moderate taxes of this kind, with a land tax of two shillings in the pound in the time of peace, and four in the time of war, always fully and equally, and for that reason frequently assessed, would have probably pro-duced as much as would have paid all the troops we should have been obliged to keep within the island in time of peace; and perhaps would have fpared a confiderable fum yearly for maintaining and improving the fortifications of all those places, which could by nature have been the most easy fortified.

And as this island lies fo conveniently for trade, and communication between the richeft parts of Europe, Afia, and Africa, it would certainly foon have become a general magazine, and mart for the trade of all those countries, if we had at first established the civil government and laws of England, for all british fubjects and foreigners, who should come to fettle in, or trade to the island; and this would have encreased encreafed confiderably the number of inhabitants. For this purpofe, it would have been neceffary to have eftablished a civil as well as a military governnor, and to have made the former absolutely independent of the latter, unless when the island was in danger of being invaded, and martial law proclaimed with the confent of a counfel and an affembly, the former appointed by the crown, and the latter chosen by the people, with the approbation of the crown, or of some officer appointed by the crown, for such an approbation would be neceffary to keep factious and feditious men out of the affembly.

Another improvement which certainly ought to have been put in execution, was the crecting more fortifications in theifland than one fingle citadel, fome of the cities, particularly Citudadella ought to have been as completely fortified as the nature of the ground would admit. The fort of St. Philip's ought not to have been fo large, nor works fo very extensive, for at present they require 8000 men to man them: the length of the late fiege is no argument to the contrary, fince the duke de Richelieu's conduct at the fiege was fo extremely faulty, that it was reported another marshal of France was ready to fet out from Paris, to take the command from him, when the news came of its furrender. And as the ground on which Marlborough redoubt stands is very high, it ought certainly to have been included within a regular and strong fortification : for the further fecurity of the harbour of Port Mahon, the intended fortification of cape Mola, ought to have been finished, and Philipet little redoubt very much enlarged : and for the fecurity of the naval ftores, Bloody Island should have been completely fortified all round, and filled with magazines, cafematted, and bomb-proof.

With regard to the natural produce of the island, there are two necessary materials for our manufactories, which it is surprising were never yet produced in common in the island, either by the natives, or by fending people thither for that purpofe, thefe are cotton and filk; the planting of the cotton fhrub has been tried here with fuccefs, and the Maltefe produce fuch quantities of it, that they export 15,000 quin-tals of cotton wool yearly; therefore it feems cer-tain, that it might be produced as freely at Minorca, and as the ifland is fo much larger than Malta, we might have expected by this time to have had large quantities of cotton wool exported yearly, had we en-couraged the producing of it by allowing it to be imported duty free. As to filk, it is very probable that mulberry trees would have done very well, if planted in Minorca, as great numbers grow in the countries on all fides of it; if that had been the cafe, it would certainly be a very fine place for breeding filk worms, as they feldom have any frost or fnow, and never of any continuance; therefore the planting of fuch trees ought at least to have been tried, and if they had fucceeded (which is extremely probable) the pains and coft which might have been expended in the attempt would very amply have been repaid us; but fuch was the ill-management of the english ministry from the time it came into our poffession, to the mo-ment it was taken, that not one of these schemes were ever tried. But it is now time to return to the motions of Mr. Byng's fleet.

in

The latter end of may commodore Broderick had been fent from England to the Mediterranean with five fhips of the line to reinforce Mr. Byng's fleet; and fome days after his failing, advice having been received by way of France of that admiral's behaviour in the engagement of the 20th of may; fir Edward Hawke, with Mr. Saunders (who had been made an admiral fome days before) and feveral captains, together with the earl of Panmure, and lord Tyrawley (appointed governor of Gibraltar, in the room of Mr. Fowke) were ordered to repair immediately to Portfmouth, there to embark on board the Antelope man man of war of 50 guns, and proceed to Gibraltar, where admiral Hawke had orders to take upon him the command of the fleet, together with Mr. Saunders, and fend Mr. Byng and Mr. Weft, and fome of the captains home immediately, lord Tyrawley had orders to fend Mr. Fowke home at the fame time, under arreft. They accordingly failed from Portfmouth in the Antelope, on the 16th of june, and arrived at Gibraltar, the 3d of july, when fir Edward Hawke took the command of his majefty's fleet; and the Antelope failed from Gibraltar the 9th, with Mr. Byng on board, and arrived at Portfmouth after a fhort paffage. Mr. Weft repaired immediately to London, and was received by his majefty in the moft gracious manner. Mr. Byng on his arrival, was immediately put under arreft.

Affairs in England. In North America. Council of war at Albany. Plan of operations. Major general Abercrombie takes the chief command. Gallant attion under Bradstreet. Of wego taken by the french. Reflections. Affairs in the East-Indies. Nabob of Bengal takes Calcutta. Reflections.

THE lofs of Minorca had thrown the nation into a flame. The clamour against the ministry was very great throughout the whole kingdon; all the corporations in England prefented addreffes to his majefty, petitioning in the ftrongeft terms for a change of ministers and measures : and indeed, the general defpondency which appeared in all ranks of men, from which, even the ministry themfelves were not entirely free, owing to the lofs of Minorca, and the dread of a french invafion, which had for fome time rooted deep in the minds of the people, was not altogether without fome reafon; for without doubt, the nation was at this time in a very melancholy condition, for though the war had not continued long enough for her refources to be exhaufted, yet the mean figure which we then made in the eyes of all Europé, was very mortifying to those englishmen, who had a true sense of their country's honour. The infults, the contemptuous ufage, and the harfh acts of oppreffion, put upon the english in general, throughout all the Mediterranean, were they not known facts, would at prefent appear incredible. At this unhappy period, the glory of our name was fullied, not only in Europe, but wherever elfe they had to combat with the victorious french : In fhort, the privateers were the only victors which then belonged to us; and thefe were almost ballanced by the number ber of fhips taken by those of the french. The affairs of North America wore the same gloomy aspect that diffinguished the appearance of its mother country in Europe.

There the french were still victorious, at least they were quite fuccessful in their plan of operations in that country, which was by any means to fecure to themfelves the fole trade and navigation of all the great lakes and rivers, on the back of the english fettlements; to effect this, they had already made very great advances; they had usurped all the immense tract of lands on the river Ohio, and fecured it for the present by the important fortress of du Quesne; they had fecured another tract by building the fort at Crown Point, and fort Cohaffer; they had erected a multitude of small forts on all the passes of the lakes to awe the indians and command their trade, those of Niagara and Frontenac, were the most confiderable; the frontiers of the Carolina's were awed and curbed by fort Condé, befides many other forts of less con-fequence fingly, but of great importance all together, as they connected the chain, which commanded all the frontiers of the english settlements, from Nova Scotia to Georgia. And what added greatly to the ftrength and formidablenefs of the french in North America, was the divided ftate of the english colonies, whereas those of the french were all connected in one gene-ral government, under the absolute military controul of the governor general of Canada. It was under these great and manifest disadvantages, that the new year, 1756, was opened in North America.

General Shirley still continued commander in chief. I left him at New York, having settled with the grand council held there, the plan of operations, which the reader may remember in my 4th chapter; he set out for Albany and arrived there the 7th of may, and continuing his preparations till the 25th, H 3 called called a council of war, to advife on his future meafures, and he took their opinions in every article, few of which were of importance.

He had heard fome time before, that there was a defign in England to fuperfede him ; but this was uncertain, till col. Webb arrived at New York from England, bringing two letters from his majefty's principal fecretaries of State, dated the 13th and 31ft of march; in the latter of which, he received his majefty's orders to repair to England. On the 20th of june, major general Abercrombie arrived at New York with Otway's, and the highland regiments, from whence he went to Albany, in company with col. Webb, and the day following took upon himfelf the chief command of all his majefty's forces in North America. Mr. Shirley gave general Abercrombie a very particular account in writing, of the ftate of every part of his majefty's fervice under his care, with the ftrength of the regiments, garrifons, and works; and also gave him his fentiments and advice in regard to the expeditions which were then in agitation, against the french. One of them, as it displays a great piece of bravery, I must be more particular in mentioning. It was a very gallant action under captain Bradstreet. That officer commanding the battoes in their way to Ofwego, was attacked by a party of french and indians in ambufcade; finding himfelf between two fires, he retired with great dexterity to a little island on the river, where, for some time, he defended himself with fix men, against forty of the enemy, and obliged them to retire; being reinforced, he attacked a large body infinitely fuperior to his own, and gained a complete victory over them, which was owing intirely to his own admirable conduct, and the aftonifhing bravery of his men.

In march last the earl of Loudon had been appointed commander in chief of all his majesty's forces in

North

North America; and general Abercrombie fent over to affume the command, till his lordfhip's arrival, which was on the 23d of july, at New York. Mr. Shirley having arrived there the 4th, his lordfhip regardlefs of his eafe, and the fatigues of a tedious voyage, refted there but three days; and on the 29th of july, reached his head quarters at Albany, when he took upon himfelf the command of the army.

Soon after his lordfhip's arrival, capt. Bradftreet difpatched intelligence, that he was informed the french were preparing to attack Ofwego, having 1200 men for that purpole encamped, not far from the eaftermost fort. Upon receipt of this intelligence, general Webb was ordered to hold himfelf in readinefs to march for its defence, with the 44th regiment; and on the 12th of august, the troops embarked for that expedition, at Albany.

In the mean time, lieutenant colonel Mercer, commanding officer at Ofwego, received repeated intelli-gence, that the enemy had fome place or camp to the eaftward of Ofwego, about 30 miles from it; and particularly on the 6th of august, that there was a large encampment of french and indians about 12 miles to the eastward of that fort ; on these intelligences, Mr. Mercer dispatched an express boat to the commanding officer upon the lake, who was then out upon a cruife to the weftward, with a brigantine and two floops; letting him know that he intended next day to fend 400 men in whale boats. to vifit the enemy, and defiring him to keep to the eastward as much as he could, in order to cover the men in the boats, and hinder the enemy from approaching nearer; but by fome ftrange neglect, or fome other private reafon, inflead of complying there-with, they returned next day to Ofwego, and in en-deavouring to enter the harbour, the brigantine was driven by a gale of wind upon rocky ground, where the lay beating about 18 hours, and was after-H 4 wards wards forced to heave down, in order to have a falfe keel.

Monfieur Montcalm, the french general, having intelligence given him of the fituation of the englifh veffels, that the brigantine was ftranded, and the other two returned into harbour, took the opportunity of transporting and landing his artillery and troops in boats, within a mile and half of fort Ontario; which, as a french officer declared after Ofwego was taken, he could not have done, had our veffels been out to the eaftward.

Their artillery, for drawing which they transported 35 horses, confisted of about 32 pieces of cannon, from 12 to 24 pounders, feveral large brass mortars and hoyets (among which was the artillery taken from general Braddock at Monongahela) and were all brought in battoes from Portland Point, as they could not have been transported by land from thence, on account of the great number of swamps, drowned lands, and creeks in the way; their forces confisted of about 1800 regular troops, 2500 canadians, and 500 indians. The french troops began to fire upon Ofwego on the 11th of august, which was returned with small arms, and eight cannon from the fort, and fhells from the other fide the river.

In fhort, the force of the french amounting to upwards of 3000 men, after a few days defence, the garrifon was obliged to furrender; but not before their governor col. Mercer was killed by a cannon ball.

During the whole fiege, the foldiers behaved with a remarkable refolution and intrepidity against the enemy, exerting themselves in the defence of the place in every part of duty; and it was with great reluctance, that they were perfuaded by their officers to lay down their arms, after the garrifon had capitulated.

Immediately .

Immediately after the furrender of Ofwego, the french demolifhed the works there, and embarked with their prifoners, provifions, artillery, and booty for fort Frontenac, in their way back to Montreal, and from thence to Quebec, where the garrifon was put on board a merchant fhip, which fet fail directly for Portfinouth in England, and exchanged them for the fame number of french prifoners.

From what I have faid, concerning the fiege of Ofwego, the reader will perceive, that the lofs of that fortress, in all probability would not have happened, if they had not brought a train of artillery against it, and that was impracticable by any other means, than by water carriage on the lake; and it appeared by the behaviour of the french veffels, and from the confession of the french officers themselves, that the english veffels fitted out upon the lake were of fufficient strength to have prevented the french from transporting their artillery, &c. by water; and confequently, if the new floop and floop Ofwego had been in a condition to have acted upon the lake, it would have rendered it quite impracticable for the enemy to have brought their artillery to Ofwego, even without the occafional affiftance of the whale boats. In regard to the ftrength of the forts at Ofwego, for refifting an army furnished with cannon, it was very infufficient; and the most particular partifans of general Shirley are forced to flur over this affair, in the most plausible manner they were able, as the arguments they use for that end, are founded too much upon the general's intentions, and expectations of the fervice of the indians; furely he might have placed the fafety of fo important a post upon stronger foundations, especially, as he had all along made Ofwego one of the principal articles of his management, whilft he had the chief command, and fpent fo much time there in perfon, in forwarding the fortifications; and, as I have faid before, had almost finished the transportation transportation of provisions, enough for 5000 men for feveral months, to that fort; one would have thought that Mr. Shirley might have known, that these methods must all be tried in vain, unless he put the fortress itself in such a state of defence, as to have nothing to fear from any armaments which the french could make against it.

I observed before, that general Webb was ordered to march to the relief of Ofwego : he was advanced as far as the german flatts, when he received an express from the commanding officer, at the great Carrying-place, august the 17th, acquainting him, that Ofwego was in the hands of the enemy. In answer to which, he received orders from general Webb to employ as large a party of men as he could fpare, in obstructing the passage of the Wood-creek, for 24 miles, by felling of trees a-crofs it; and in a few days the general arrived there himfelf, and immediately fent out fresh parties to affist in stopping up the passage of the Wood-creek. Upon his arrival at the Carrying-place, there were about 1500 regular troops there, which, together with the feamen, battoe-men, &c. made upwards of 2500 fighting men, and fir Will. Johnson was then marching thither, with the albany As general Webb was entirely ignorant of militia. the firength of the french forces that had taken Ofwego, or the rout they had marched, he encamped at the great Carrying-place, and threw up an entrenchment and breaft-work round his camp, upon which he mounted 28 pieces of cannon.

But foon after, repeated intelligence being brought to the general, that the french had evacuated Ofwego, and were marching home again; he ordered all the battoes he had with him, to be loaded with all the flores, cannon, ammunition, and provisions that were there, and proceed back again to Albany: and as to the forts at the Carrying-place, he ordered them to be pulled down, burnt, and deftroyed. This was of very bad confequence; for the indians inhabiting the country round thefe forts, were no fooner left unprotected, than they wavered in their alliance with the englifh; and this measure was also needlefs in another respect, as the french who conquered Oswego had marched back again; whereas, general Webb stopped up the Wood-creek, and demolished the forts at the great Carrying-place, in expectation of the enemy's marching against him.

(107)

This was the last affair in which Mr. Shirley was any ways concerned, as commander in chief; I mean the lofs of Ofwego. It is very difficult to pronounce decifively on the abilities of a man, from the tranfactions he is concerned in during one year's command ; at least this is the case with regard to general Shirley : with great justness, and the strictest impartiality one may venture to pronounce, that he was an able man, though unequal in appearance to the weight of public care, which he affumed when he undertook the chief command ; the greatest flaw in his conduct . was the lofs of Ofwego, the prefervation of which place, he had many times declared to be the chief point he had in view for a long time; and it is natural to fuppofe, that when a general himfelf undertakes to fee any post fortified, that fuch a fortress should at least be strong enough to resist an ene-my a reasonable time; at least this was certainly to have been expected in regard to Ofwego: but after all the objections which have been raifed against his conduct, yet we should remember, that if, upon the most strict enquiry, we find he was in his command very faulty, those ministers in England, who permitted him to continue in it, were alfo faulty, in a like proportion, for not being acquainted with the merits of the man they promoted. It was indeed a little unufual to find a private perfon, who had been originally bred to the law, at the univerfity in Cambridge, and feeking his fortune in the manner manner Mr. Shirley did, rife almost at once to be generalissimo in America, with the appointments and pay of the great duke of Marlborough.

Such was the bad fuccefs of his majefty's arms in America ; and in the Eaft-Indies, affairs wore a ftill worfe afpect: the company, by the bad ma-nagement of their affairs, which is just what one would expect from the dominion of a company of traders, loft their valuable fettlement at Bengal. It feems that Alvedeikam, nabob of Bengal, having died in the beginning of may 1756, his nephew, Saradjot Dollah fucceeded him. This fucceffion occafioned much difcontent and trouble. Saradjot proving a most abominable tyrant, his subjects many of them conspired against him, and being discovered, took refuge in the english fettlement at Calcutta. The nabob marched against that place with an army, and after making fome enormous demands, laid fiege to it; governor Dr-k-pretended to be a quaker, perfuaded many people to fend their treasures on board a ship in the river with him to save them, which many did; the governor then, with the officer next in command, fet fail, and left the garrifon, uncommanded, to take care of themfelves. They, dif-pirited by this behaviour, foon furrendered, and were treated with the greatest cruelty; what 200 of them suffered in the black hole is too shocking and too fresh in every one's memory to be forgot. It was expected that the governor would have been called to account for his bad behaviour at Calcutta, in/ leaving the garrifon to take care of themfelves; but he efcaped without fo much as a trial; it was faid for his excufe, that he was a quaker, and con-fequently his conficience would not allow him to fight; but fuppoling that was the cafe, yet there remains a query that will be difficult to be anfwered ; and that is, why did the next commanding officer follow fo bad an example and go away with him, that

(130) that gentleman was no quaker by religion, although he shewed himself to have the same aversion to fighting. It is equally a difgrace to the english East-India company, the appointing a quaker to be com-mander of a place of such importance, and the leav-ing it in such a defenceles condition : but such overfights and weak management is generally to be found in the affairs of a company of traders, who as fuch may be confpicuous, but as warriors contemptible.

Affairs in Europe. Court martial on lieut. gen. Fowke. Reflections. Recapitulation of the Affairs of Germany. Negotiations in Germany, from 1744 to 1756. Meafures of the courts of Vienna, Petersburg, and Dresden. They prepare for war. King of Prussia memorial to the empress queen, and her answer. Conduct of the court of Saxony. Of his prussian majesty. Reflections.

IN 'Europe, the affairs of the british nation wore but a gloomy aspect, proceeding from the sense of those difgraces, which that brave people met with in other parts of the world; and which could not but damp the fpirits of every englishman, who had the leaft regard for the honour and welfare of his country. During the course of the unfortunate year, 1756, England was ftripped of the valuable island of Minorca, and fuffered a fevere difgrace under admiral Byng. In North America, the important fortrefs of Ofwego was conquered by the french; and a general unfuccefs fullied the britifh arms. In the Eaft-Indies indeed, the pirate Angria was conquered, and thereby the india company received great advantages, their trade was more fecure and lefs interrupted; but this good fortune was foon after followed by the lofs of Calcutta; fo that in this country, the english were far from being fuccessful; and then adding to thefe instances, the fuccess which the french met with in their fmall fquadrons, always efcaping the fuperior ones of the english, we may justly conclude, with repeating how much the martial credit of the nation fuffered by the events which happened from the beginning of this war, to the period I am now fpeaking of. But to return.

The reader may remember, that when Admiral Byng arrived at Gibraltar, in his way to the relief of Minorca, he, purfuant to his inftructions, demanded of lieut. gen. Fowke a detachment from his garrifon, equal to a battalion, to take on board his fleet and carry to reinforce the garrifon of St. Philip's; and that Mr. Fowke had received his majefty's orders to comply with fuch demand; but he, in confequence of the weakness of his garrifon, called a council of war at Gibraltar, to confider whether it was expedient. as the ftate of affairs then ftood in the Mediterranean, to obey these commands; and that it was refolved by this council of war, not to fend fuch a detachment on board Mr. Byng's fleet. It was for difobedience to these orders, that lieut. gen. Fowke was brought before the following board of general officers, appointed to enquire into his behaviour, and who met the 10th of august, 1760, viz.

Gen. fir Robert Rich, prefident, Gen. fir John Ligonier, Lieut. gen. Hawley, Lieut. gen. lord Cadogan, Lieut. gen. Guife, Lieut. gen. Onflow, Lieut. gen. Pultney, Lieut. gen. Huske, Lieut. gen. Campbell, Lieut. gen. lord de la Warr, Lieut. gen. Charles duke of Marlborough, Lieut. gen. Wolfe, Lieut. gen. Cholmondeley, Major gen. Lascelles, Major gen. Bockland, Major gen. lord Geo. Beauclerk.

The members of this court being fworn, and the neceffary papers read, the judge advocate opened the profecution, by accufing the general of difobedience

to

to his majefty's orders. The nature of this court martial, did not require that many witneffes fhould be examined, the principal part of the proceedings was the general's defence. Having prepared it, it was read, and was as follows;

"That he received these three letters together; by the fame hand, and must therefore take them together. That his orders were confused at least, if not contradictory: that if they were confused, then he could not know how to execute them; and if they were contradictory, they could not be executed at all.

My orders being confused and contradictory, I called a council of war, not to deliberate whether I should obey my orders or not, but only to take their fense, what was the meaning of them.

The whole number which I had then in garrifon, was but 2700 men. I had fpared to Mr. Edgecomb's fhips 230, which, with 40 of my men which he had left in St. Philip's, made 270. The ordinary duty of the garrifon required in workmen and guards 800 men, fo that I had then only 130 men mere than three reliefs. If I had made the detachment of a battalion, and put it on beard the fleet, I fhould not then have had much more than two reliefs, and this at a time, when I believed the place was in danger of being attacked, for good reafons, which I do not think myfelf at liberty to mention."

When the judge advocate had finished reading the general's defence; Mr. Fowke made a speech to the court, by which he enforced what he before insisted upon, that the orders delivered to him were confused and contradictory, and that in every fense that could be put upon them, they were discretionary, that is to fay, to be complied with, or not to be complied with, according as the admiral and he should, from the then circumstances of affairs, judge to be most for his majesty's fervice.

The reader perceives, that the general's defence confifts in the fuppolition of his order's being difcretionary cretionary, and thefe certainly were fome queftions, which would make one think, they either were fo, or contradictory. The judge advocate being ordered to read a letter from the fecretary at war to general Fowke, began it thus :

(113)

" I wrote to you by general Stuart; if that order " is not complied with, then you are," &c. &c. Upon which the general very naturally afked, how could his lordfhip write, " If that order is not com-" plied with," if he had thought it an abfolute order, and not difcretionary.

Another very odd answer was made, during the fitting of the court, which is very worthy of being re-membered to the credit of its author.

General Fowke asked the secretary at war, " But " is it not the cuftom of your office, when fecond " orders are intended to fuperfede the first, to men-" tion that they do fo?" In reply to which, my lord Barrington faid, " I had then been but about four " months in my office." This answer, I think, needs no comment.

When the queftion came to be put, to acquit or to fuspend for one year, the court was equally di-vided, there being eight for acquitting, and eight for fuspending; and as, in fuch cafes the prefident has a cafting vote, he gave it for sufpending. Which fen-tence being reported to his majesty, he thought fit to difmis him from his fervice.

Such were the refolutions of this council of war. I must make a few remarks on the evidence that appeared on the trial, which I shall do with the strictest impartiality. General Fowke received two orders from the fecretary at war, the first to receive lord Robert Bertie's regiment into his garrifon, and to fend a detachment on board the fleet; the fecond faid nothing about lord Robert Bertie's regiment, but repeated the other order. On the receipt of them, he directly called a council of war, and laid before them the state of his own garrison, and the the difficulty of throwing fuccours into Minorca, and defired their opinion concerning the expediency of obeying his orders, whether it was for his majefty's fervice. The general afterwards in his defence declared, that he called this council of war, not to confider whether he fhould obey his orders, or not, but to know the meaning of them : if this was really the cafe, would it not have been natural for him to lay his orders before them, and, in one word to afk their opinions, whether they were difcretionary or abfolute; but fo far from this, there never paffed a doubt about his orders, the point in difpute amongft them was, whether they fhould be obeyed, or no.

One point, indeed, spoke for him, which was the beginning of lord Barrington's letter, of the 12th of may. " I wrote you by general Stuart; if that or-" der was not complied with, then," this was in one fense faying, that the order by general Stuart was difcretionary, for his lordship must know, or had at least great reason to think, that Mr. Fowke had received those by general Stuart. But what con-demns him most of all was, his letter to the secretary at war, dated the 6th of may, wherein he tells him, " That he had, with the advice of a council of " war, difobeyed his order, and that he had been in-" duced to act fo, on the confideration of the weak " ftate of his garrifon ;" but never once mentions that he had acted according to his judgment in obedience to his lordship's discretionary orders; which he certainly would have done, had he really thought they were difcretionary. If the general thought his orders to be fo undoubtedly difcretionary, what occafion was there to call a council of war, to know their meaning? as he fays in his defence he did. In fhort, it was that fatal letter to lord Barrington, which convinced the court martial of the general's difobedience ; had he not produced it, many have thought, that he would have been acquitted; but that letter convinced convinced them, that he himfelf thought his orders abfolute.

But to leave the gloomy affairs of England for a moment, and turn our eyes on those of more refplendent and magnificent eclat; we must accompany the reader through the principal courts in Germany, and point out the feeming fecret caufes of those great events, which for fome years held all Europe equally in fuspence, and aftonishment. As the courts of Berlin and Vienna were the principals in this famous contest, it will be necessary (for the information of the reader) to prefent him with a recapitulation of the general affairs of Germany, antecedent to the period. I am fpeaking of : and more particularly of the two courts abovementioned.

Every one, who is the leaft verfed in the hiftory of Germany, must know, that Frederick William the IId, elector of Brandenburg, was one of the greateft and most diftinguished princes of his time, both for wifdom and courage; which were always properly employed for his own fecurity, and the benefit of his people. He entered upon the government, in the year 1640, a time when the affairs of Germany, and his own, were in a very difficult and embarrafied fituation. In the year 1687, this prince came to an amicable conclusion with the emperor Leopold, in relation to a difpute, which had long fublifted, concerning the principality of Jagerndorff in Silefia; the inveftiture of which had been conferred on the margraves of Brandenburg, by Lewis, king of Bohemia, about the year 1523; which duchy had afterwards been refumed by the house of Austria, under several trifling pretentions, at times when the power of the auftrian family was undifturbed, and that of Brandenburg involved in the confusion of war. In compensation for this principality, the elector had the territory of Schwibus, in the northern part of Silefia yielded up to him, which the emperor afterwards I 2 found found means to obtain back from his fon and fucceffor.

Frederick III fucceeded his father in the electorate of Brandenburg, in april, 1688; and, like feveral of his predeceffors, entered upon the administration of affairs, at a conjuncture, which required a prince of great parts to conduct them to advantage.

This great and magnificent prince died in the 56th year of his age, and was fucceeded in all his dominions by Frederick William, prince royal of Pruffia, and electoral prince of Brunfwick, whole reign was no lefs glorious, than that of his father's, fhewing, in every transaction of his life, that he was in every inftance careful to maintain and fupport his own dignity, to fecure his dominions, to make himfelf respected by his neighbours, to keep his troops and fortreffes conftantly in fuch a pofture, as might prevent his being hurt by any unforeseen accident; and give him an opportunity, where the circumstan-ces of things would permit it, of turning any such accident to his advantage. It was, with this view, that he kept always on foot, between 80 and 100,000 regular troops well paid, and perfectly well difciplined; at the fame time that he was no lefs careful of his revenues, as being thoroughly fenfible, that if ever a war became neceffary, treasure would be to the full as needful as troops.

Charles Frederick, the prefent king of Pruffia, and elector of Brandenburg, was born january the 24th, 1712, and confequently was in the 29th year of his age, when he mounted the throne. I shall be more particular in what relates to this great monarch, antecedent to the period I shall attempt to write the history of, as he afterwards shone forth with so diffinguishing a lustre, in the late war.

The very dawning of this young monarch's government drew the attention of all Europe, and gave his neighbours very just ideas of what might be expected in the progress of it. He had been but indifferently indifferently treated in his father's life-time, and there confequently were many who dreaded his refentments; but he punifhed no body except the counfellor Eckard, whom he ordered to depart his dominions, becaufe he had been a conftant devifer of taxes, and the principal inftrument of the late king, in laying burthens upon his fubjects; fo that in his manner of treating him, the new monarch fhewed that he could avenge the wrongs done to his people, though he was at the fame time patient under his own. He was no fooner poffeffed of the crown, than he declared himfelf a protector of learning; and by a letter written with his own hand, invited the famous Mr. Maupertuis from Paris, to take upon him the direction of the academy of Berlin; or, as the king himfelf elegantly expreffed it, to graft the flips of true fcience on the wild ftocks in the north *.

This young monarch, in the difputes he had concerning the barony of Herftall, and principality of Neufchatel, with the bifhop of Liege, and the duke of Chevreufe, manifefted to his neighbours, the firmnefs and vigour of his government. Thefe however, were but as preludes to the great flroke of all, by which his majefty added a great part of the rich and fruitful country of Silefia to his dominions : which, as it has been confidered as the occafion of the general war of 1741, and bore a confiderable fhare in that of which I am giving the hiftory; the reader will naturally expect, that we fhould be a little more particular in the account of this fingular tranfaction.

I have already flown, that the houfe of Brandenburg had a very fair title to the principality of Jagerndorf, and other territories in that country, which

* Vide Prefent State of Europe, from which ingenious work I have taken great part of this account of the king of Prufia, preceding the war. the emperor, notwithstanding united to the kingdom of Bohemia; but as the elector ftill kept up his claim, and the house of Austria had great need of his affistance, it was found neceffary to give him fome fatisfaction; and accordingly a treaty was fet on foot at Berlin, in 1686, whereby it was ftipulated, that the elector should renounce all the pretensions of his house, to the principalities of Jagerndorf, Lignitz, Brieg and Wohau, upon condition that the emperor should yield to the elector, the territory of Schwibus. The baron de Frytag, who managed this negotiaation for the court of Vienna, with the elector Frederick II, fet on foot at the fame time another clandeftine treaty with the electoral prince Frederick, who was afterwards Frederick III, elector of Brandenburg, though he is generally called Frederick I, becaule he was the first king of Pruffia.

The nature of this fecret negotiation was very dark; for there were fome family difputes, in which the emperor threatened to take part against the prince, if, at the fame time his father fubfcribed the treaty abovementioned, he did not fubscribe an obligation to give up, as foon as it fhould be in his power the territory of Schwibus, for a fmall fum of money. Accordingly, when he became elector of Brandenburg, the money was offered, and the territory demanded ; but all the counfellors of the new elector advised him not to part with it, as he had been compelled to make this agreement, which, in its own nature therefore was void; but the emperor Leopold infifting upon it, and threatening to use force, he yielded up the territory; but refused to confirm the renunciation made by his father, of his former right.

Thus the reader fees, in a few words, the nature of the king of Pruffia's claim; he reprefented both Frederick II, and Frederick III, confequently the rights of both were in him; and, as the house of Auftria had taken away the equivalent, he conceived he had had a just right to the territories formerly in the poffeffion of his family, viz. the principality of Jagern-dorf, and other countries, of which he refolved immediately to take poffession. He had two reasons for acting in this manner, without any previous declarations made to the court of Vienna; the first was, that the male line of the house of Austria being extinct, and the power of that family thereby weakened, he thought this a favourable opportunity of doing himfelf juffice; and that he fhould be wanting to himfelf and his pofterity, or fuccesfors, if he neglected it. His fecond, that the elector of Bavaria and the king of Spain forming pretensions upon the em-peror's fucceffion, he was defirous of reconciling his view of doing himfelf justice, to the inclination he had of affifting Mary Therefa queen of Hungary, in maintaining her rights to her father's dominions, agreeable to the pragmatic fanction.

At the fame time therefore, that he ordered his troops to march into Silefia, which was in december, 1740, he declared toh e court of Vienna, that notwithstanding this step, he was disposed to promote the election of the duke of Lorrain to the imperial dignity; that he was willing to advance the queen of Hungary two millions of florins; and that he was ready to employ all his forces in defending her do-minions, against all her competitors. But these propositions were absolutely rejected, upon which a war enfued. It is to be observed, that in this article I am ftating the claims, pretenfions, and meafures of his prussian majesty, as matters of fact; and am very far from taking upon me to decide, whether the for-mer were well or ill founded, and confequently whether the latter were right or wrong; but thus much, I think, I may be allowed to fay, that if the court of Vienna had accepted of this propolal, the war in Germany had been prevented, and the empress gueen had not yielded more to the king of Pruffia, than the was obliged to do afterwards, after all the I 4 blood blood and treasure spent on both sides in this fatal quarrel.

His pruffian majesty carried his point in the first instance; that is to fay, he made himself master of Silefia, without much opposition; and the auftrians having brought a great army into the field, under the command of the field marshal count Nieuperg; in the beginning of the next fpring, his pruffian majefty gave that army battle, the 10th of april, 1741, at Molwitz, in which, though with great effusion of blood, he gained the victory. In may, 1742, he fought the famous battle of Czaslau, in which he alfo claimed the victory; but both parties being now weary of the war, a treaty of peace was negotiated between his majefty on one part, and the queen of Hungary on the other, which was concluded and figned june the 11th, at Breflau in Silefia; by which the greatest part of that duchy, and the whole county of Glatz were yielded to his majefty.

But this valuable ceffion did not hinder him from entering into the league of Frankfort, in fupport of the emperor Charles VII, in confequence of which, he invaded Bohemia, and took the city of Prague, in june, 1744, won the uncontested victory of Friedburg in june, 1745, and that of Stadentz in the fep-tember following. Yet, the auftrians still perfisting to continue the war, prefuming on the diversion to be made by a great body of ruffian auxiliaries, which it was fuppofed would have marched through Poland into his territories. But his pruffian majefty took advantage of the feafon, and while his enemies were pleafing themfelves, with the hopes of invading and ruining his country, the old prince of Anhault Deffau, with a pruffian army entered their's. The king of Poland was obliged to abandon his hereditary dominions, and to retire to the frontiers of Bohemia for fafety. Leipfick opened her gates to the conqueror, and though a numerous army of faxons and auftrians interposed, to preserve Dresden, yet, december the 4th.

4th, 1745, they were totally defeated by the prince of Anhalt Deffau, with half their number of pruffian troops.

The king entered Drefden in triumph, and having overcome all his enemies, on the 14th of the fame month, overcame his provocation and refentment; and in the full warmth of victory, gave them a fair and equitable peace. By which, Silefia was again folemnly yielded to him; the faxons gave him one million of crowns for the expence of the war; his majefty acknowledged the emperor, guarantied the dominions of the emprefs queen, and included his ally, the elector Palatine, in the fame treaty, which was negotiated under the mediation of his britannic majefty, and the conclusion of which, once more fettled the tranquility of Germany.

I now come to the negotiations, which gave rife more immediately to the war, of which I am giving an account; but the more clearly to do this, it is neceffary to look back, a little before the peace of Drefden, which I have juft mentioned. I shall here acquaint the reader, that most of the facts mentioned in my account of that series of projects, confpiracies, treachery of the courts of Vienna, and Drefden, is felected from the authentic pieces published by his majesty of Prussia, when he possessed himself of Drefden.

To come at the fource of all these dark negotiations, which afterwards threw the greatest part of Europe into a flame, we must look back as far as the war that preceded the peace of Dresden. The fond hopes that the two courts of Austria and Saxony had conceived, upon the fuccess of the campaign, in 1744, gave occasion to a treaty of eventual partition, which they concluded the 18th of may, 1745, agreeably to which, the court of Vienna was to have the duchy of Silesia, and the county of Glatz; and the king of Poland, elector of Saxony, the duchies of Magdeburg, and Crossen, the circles of Zullichow, and (122) and Schwibus, together with the pruffian part of Lufatia; or only part of those provinces, in proportion to their conquests.

Δ

Soon after the peace of Drefden, which was figned the 25th of december, 1745, there was no further room for a treaty of fo extraordinary a nature, as that of an eventual partion, with regard to a power, with whom the two contracting parties lived in peace; but yet the court of Vienna made no fcruple to propofe to the court of Saxony, a new treaty of alliance, in which they fhould likewife renew the treaty of eventual partition, of the 18th of may, 1745.

The court of Saxony thought it neceffary, in the first place, to give a greater confistency to their plan, by grounding it upon an alliance between the courts of Russia and Vienna. These two powers did in fact conclude a defensive alliance at Petersburg, the 22d of may, 1746. But it is easy to perceive, that the body or oftensible part of this treaty was drawn up merely with a view, to conceal the fix fecret articles from the knowledge of the public; the fourth of which is levelled fingly against Prussia, according to the counterpart of it, found by his prussian majefty among the other flate papers, in the cabinet at Drefden.

In this article, the empress queen of Hungary and Bohemia, fets out with a protestation, that she will religiously observe the treaty of Dresden; but she fays a little-lower, " If the king of Prussia should " be the first to depart from this peace, by attacking " either her majesty, the empress queen of Hungary " and Bohemia, or her majesty the empress of Russia, " or even the republic of Poland, in all which cases, " the rights of her majesty, the empress queen to " Silessia, and the county of Glatz, would again take " place, and recover their full effect; the two con-" tracting parties shall mutually affiss each other " with a body of 60,000 men, to reconquer Silessia, " &c."

The reader will at once perceive the unjust tendency of this article; and these were the titles, by which the court of Vienna propofed to avail itfelf of, for the recovery of Silefia. Every war that could arife between the king of Pruffia and Ruffia, or the republic of Poland, is to be looked upon as a manifest infraction of the peace of Dresden, and a revival of the rights of the house of Austria to Silesia; though neither Ruffia nor the republic of Poland were at all concerned in the treaty of Drefden; and though the latter, with which Pruffia otherwife lived in the most intimate friendship, was not then even in alliance with the court of Vienna. From this it feems very manifest, that the 4th fecret article of the treaty of Petersburg, is so far from being a defensive alliance, that it contains a plan of an offenfive alliance, tending to wreft Silefia from the king of Pruffia.

From this article it feems obvious, that the court of Vienna had prepared three pretences for the recovery of Silefia; and by comparing it with her conduct from that time, it is very vifible that the thought to attain her end, either by provoking the king of Prufia to commence a war againft her, or by kindling one between his majefty and Ruffia or Poland, by her fecret intrigues or machinations; confidering which, it is not a matter of any wonder, that this treaty of Peterfburg fhould have been the hinge upon which all the auftrian politics have turned, from the peace of Drefden to this time; and that the negotiations of the court of Vienna have been principally directed to ftrengthen this alliance, by the acceffion. of other powers.

The court of Saxony was the first that was invited to this acceffion, in the beginning of the year, 1746. They eagerly accepted the invitation, as foon as made; furnished their ministers at Petersburg, count de Vicedom, and the fieur Pezold, with the neceffary full powers for that purpose; and ordered them to declare, declare, that their court was not only ready to accede to the treaty itfelf; but alfo to the fecret article against Pruffia : and alfo, that if, upon any fresh attack from the king of Pruffia, the empress queen should, by their affistance, happen not only to reconquer Silefia, and the county of Glatz, but also to reduce him within narrower bounds; the king of Poland, as elector of Saxony, would ftand to the partition ftipulated between his polish majesty and the empress queen, by the convention figned at Leipfick, the 18th of may, 1745. Count Lofs, the faxon minister at Vienna, was charged, at the fame time, to open a private negotiation, for fettling an eventual partition of the conquests. which should be made on Pruffia, by laying down, as the basis of it, the partition treaty of Leipsick, of the 18th of may, 1745.

Throughout this unaccountable negotiation, it was affectedly fuppoled, that the king of Pruffia would be the aggreffor against the court of Vienna. But what right could the king of Poland draw from thence, to make conquests upon the king of Pruffia ? Or, if his polifh majesty, in the quality of an auxiliary, would also become a belligerent party; it could not be taken amis, that his pruffian majesty should treat him accordingly, and regulate his conduct by that of the court of Saxony. This is a truth that was acknowledged, even by the king of Poland's own privy council; for being confulted upon their masser's accession to the treaty of Petersburg, they were of opinion, that the 4th fecret article went beyond common rules; and that his pruffian majesty might look upon the accession to it as a violation of the peace of Drefden.

Count Brühl, prime minister to the king of Poland, being, without doubt, thoroughly convinced himfelfof this truth, did all in his power to conceal the existence of the fecret articles of the treaty of Petersburg. For, at the time that he was eagerly negotiating in Russia, upon his court's accession to it, and to its fecret eret articles, he caufed a folemn declaration to be made at Paris, " That the treaty of Peterfburg, to which " his polifh majefty had been invited to accede, did " not contain any thing more than what was in the " german copy," as appears from the count de Brühl's letter to count Lofs of the 18th of june, 1747; and by a memorial, which count Lofs delivered in confequence of it.

It is true, that the court of Saxony did yet defer, from one time to another, their acceding in form to the treaty of Petersburg; but they did not fail to let their allies know, again, and again, that they were ready to accede to it, without reftriction, as foon as it could be done without too evident rifk, and their fhare of the advantages to be gained should be fe-cured to them. This principal is clearly expressed, in the inftructions given the 19th of february, 1750, to general d'Arnim, when he was going to Petersburg, as minister from Saxony. This court being invited afresh, in the year, 1751, to accede to the treaty of Petersburg, declared its readiness to do it, in a memorial delivered to the ruffian minister at Dresden, and even fent full powers, and other neceffary papers for that purpofe, to the fieur Funck, their minister at Petersburg; but required at the fame time, that the king of England, as elector of Hanover, should previoully accede to the fecret articles of the treaty of Petersburg;—And as his britannic majesty would never be concerned in this mistery of iniquity, count Brühl found himfelf obliged to wait the iffue of the project, which had been formed, to make another alliance, of fo innocent a nature as to be producible; the courts of Vienna and Saxony thought it neceffary to put on these outward appearances of moderation, that they might not wound the delicacy of fuch of their allies, as were ftaggered at the fecret views of the alliance of Petersburg; but for their part, they never loft fight of their darling plan, to divide the fpoils of the king of Prussia beforehand, in keeping conftantly conftantly to the fourth article of that treaty as their bafis.

The reader will clearly perceive, from all the proofs that have now been produced, that the court of Saxony, without having acceded to the treaty of Peterfburg, in form, was not lefs an accomplice in the dangerous defigns, which the court of Vienna had grounded upon this treaty; and that, having been difpenced with by their allies, from a formal concurrence, they had only waited for the moment when they might, without running too great a rifk, concur in effect, and fhare the fpoils of their neighbour.

In expectation of this period, the auftrian and faxon ministers laboured in concert, and underhand, with the more ardour to prepare the means of bringing the cafe of the fecret alliance of Petersburg to exist: In this treaty it was laid down as a principle, that any war whatever between the king of Prufia and Ruffia, would authorife the empress queen to retake Silefia. There was nothing more, then, to be done, but to raife fuch a war. In order to bring this about, no means were found more proper, than to embroil the king of Pruffia irreconcileably with her majefty, the emprefs of Ruffia, and to provoke that princefs, by all forts of falfe infinuations, impostures, and the most atrocious calumnies, in laying to the king of Pruffia's charge, all forts of defigns against Russia, and even the empress's own person; and then upon Poland with regard to Sweden.

The inftructions which the court of Saxony gave, in 1750, to general d'Arnim, when he was going to Peterfburg, as their minifter plenipotentiary, contains one express article, by which he is charged to keep, up dexteroufly the diffrunc and jealoufy of Ruffia with regard to Pruffia, and to applaud every arrangement that might be taken against the latter. But no body executed these orders better than the fieur de Funck, the faxon minister at Petersburg, who was the life and foul of the whole party. This minister never let an opportunity opportunity efcape him, of infinuating, that the king of Pruffia was forming defigns upon Courland, Polifh Pruffia, and the city of Dantzick; that the courts of France, Pruffia, and Sweden, were hatching vaft projects, in cafe of a vacancy of the throne of Poland; and numberlefs other falfities of the fame kind; which his pruffian majefty has fufficiently contradicted by his fubfequent conduct, which he has followed to the republic of Poland, and by the caution he has ufed never to intrude himfelf into the domeftic affairs of Poland and Courland, notwithftanding the example other powers had fet him.

It would be tedious to mention all the infinuations of this nature, which occur in the correspondence of the faxon ministers. But more particularly in their difpatches of the 6th of december, 1753; 6th and 13th of february; 28th of july, and 1st of december, 1754; wherein, among other infinuations, are mentioned, the commercial arrangements, the erection of mints, and of armaments in Pruffia; and in one of the difpatches is faid, that the king of Pruffia's views of aggrandifement upon polifh Pruffia, and his project to ruin the commerce of Dantzick, were well known. These ministers even gave out in a private manner, that France and Prussia had been busied a long time at the Ottoman Porte, in raifing up a war against Russia; and that, if they fucceeded therein, the king of Pruffia would not fail to execute his defign upon Courland. They next infinuated, that the king of Pruffia had found a channel in Courland by which he came at all the fecrets of the court of Ruffia.

By the concurrence of fo many calumnies and impoltures, they at length fucceeded, in enfnaring the emprefs of Ruffia's good faith and equity, and in prejudicing her against the king of Pruffia, to fuch a degree, that by the refult of the affemblies of the fenate of Ruffia, held on the 14th and 15th of may, 1753, it was laid down for a fundamental maxim of the empire, to oppose every further aggrandifment of that that monarch, and to cruſh him by a fuperior force, as foon as a favourable opportunity fhould occur, of reducing the houſe of Brandenburg to its primitive ftate of mediocrity. This refolution was renewed in a great council, held in the month of october, 1755, and was extended fo far, that it was refolved, "With-" out any father difcuffion, whether that prince fhould " happen to attack any of the allies of the court of " Rufila, or one of the allies of that court fhould " begin with him *".

In order to form an idea of the joy, which count Brühl conceived upon this refolution of the court of Ruffia, and how well he was difpofed to bring his own to concur it; I fhall produce the following paffages. In the difpatch of the 11th of november, 1755. He anfwers the fieur Funck; that, " The " deliberations of the grand council are fo much the " more glorious to Ruffia, in that there can be no-" thing more beneficial to the common caufe, than " previoufly to fettle the effectual means of deftroy-" ing the overgrown power of Pruffia, and the un-" bounded ambition of that court."

The convention of a neutrality in Germany, figned at London the 16th of january, having filenced all count Brühl's calumnies, and fhaken his iniquitous fyftem; he redoubled his efforts in Ruffia, in order to prevent the re-eftablifhment of a good underftanding between the king of Pruffia and the court of Peterfburg. In his letter of the 23d of june, 1756, he explained himfelf upon this fubject in the following terms:

* In the fame letter is the following paffage, " To this end the " court of Ruffia will erect magazines for 100,000 men at Riga, " Mittau, Liebau, and Windau; and they have found for this " fervice a fund of two millions and a half of rubles, and another " annual fund of a million and an half, to maintain thefe arrange-" ments."

Extracted from a letter from the fieurFunck, to count de Brühl. Peterfburg, october 20, 1755. ⁴⁴ A reconciliation between the courts of Berlin and ⁴⁴ Peterfburg, would be the moft critical and the ⁴⁴ moft dangerous event that could happen. It is ⁴⁵ to be hoped, that Ruffia will not hearken to fuch ⁴⁴ odious propofals; and that the court of Vienna ⁴⁴ will be able to thwart fo fatal a union."

The court of Vienna having perfectly fucceeded in this refpect; and imagining, after the new connections they entered into this year, that they had caught the opportunity of recovering Silefia without obftruction; they loft no time in taking their measures accordingly, all Europe faw with furprife, the armaments the court of Ruffia made in the fpring, both by fea and land, without any apparent object; they gave out that these preparations were made in confequence of the treaty concluded with the court of Enggland, in 1755; but it was very plain, that this declaration was a mere pretence, fince. England had made no requifition for fuccours. Soon after this, Bohemia and Moravia were crowded with troops; magazines formed; and all the preparations made for an immediate war. The defigns of the king of Pruffia's enemies were vast and unbounded. The difpatches of count Fleming, which his pruffian majefty afterwards published, with other important papers of the fame nature, are filled with a great num-ber of curious paffages. Amongst others, he relates, that count Kayferling had received orders to fpare neither pains nor money, in order to get an exact know-ledge of the state of the revenues of the court of Vienna; and he affures, that this court had remitted a million of florins to Peterfburg. He very often expresses his own perfuasion of an established concert between the two courts of Vienna and Russia;--that the latter, in order the better to difguife the true reafons of their armaments, made them under the apparent pretence of being thereby in a condition to fulfil the engagements they had contracted with England; -And that when all the preparations should be finished, they K they were to fall unexpectedly on the king of Prufia. This perfuation runs through all his difpatches; and it is reafonable to give credit to a minister fo intelligent, fo well informed, and fo much in the way of being fo.

Upon combining these circumstances together, viz. -That treaty of Peteriburg, which authorifes the the court of Vienna to recover Silefia, as foon as a war breaks out between Pruffia and Ruffia ;- The refolution folemnly taken in Ruffia, to attack the king of Pruffia upon the first opportunity, whether he fhould be the aggreffor or be attacked ;- The armaments of the two imperial courts, at a time, when neither of them had any enemy to fear, but when the conjunctures feemed to favour the views of the court of Vienna upon Silefia;—The ruffian minifters for-mally owning, that those armaments were defigned againft the king ;—Count Kaunitz's tacit avowal ;— The pains which the ruffian minifters took to make out a pretence for accufing the king of Pruffia, of having endeavoured to ftir up a rebellion in Ukraine : -From the combination of all these circumstances, I fay, there refults a kind of demonstration, of a fecret concert entered into against his prussian majefty.

That wife monarch could not fhut his eyes againft meafures of fuch a tendency as thefe, which were likely to become fo fatal to himfelf, as his majefty had been fo long informed of all thefe particulars, from good quarters. The immenfe preparations of the court of Vienna, at leaft obliged him to order M. Klinggrafe, his plenipotentiary minifter at the imperial court, to demand of the empress queen, whether all those great preparations of war, which were making on the frontiers of Silessia, were designed against the king, or what were the intentions of her imperial majesty? To this equitable demand, the empress queen answered in express terms, "That in the pre-" fent juncture, she had found it necessary to make

" armaments, armaments, as well for her own defence, as for that of her allies, and which did not tend to the prejudice of any body."

So vague an anfwer at fo critical a time, required a more precife explanation. Wherefore M. Kling-grafe received fresh orders, and represented to the emprefs, that after the king, his master, had diffembled as long as he thought confiftent with his fafety and glory, the bad defigns which were imputed to the emprefs, would not fuffer him longer to difguife any thing; that he had orders to inform her, that the king was acquainted with the offenfive projects, which the two courts had formed at Petersburg; that he knew, they had engaged to attack him together unexpectedly; the empress queen with 80,000, and the empress of ruffia with 120,000 men; that this defign, which was to have been put in execution in the fpring of this year, was deferred till next fummer, on account of the ruffian troops wanting recruits; their fleet mariners; and Livonia, corn to fupport them; that the king made the empress arbiter of peace or war; that if she desired peace, he required of her a clear and formal declaration, confifting of a politive affurance, that she had no intention to attack the king either this year or the next; but that he fhould look on any ambiguous answer as a declaration of war; and that he called heaven to witnefs, that the empress alone would be guilty of the innocent blood that should be spilt, and of the unhappy confequences of war.

To fo just and reasonable a demand was given an answer still more haughty, and less fatisfactory than the former, the purport whereof will be sufficient to convince the public of the ill intentions of the court of Vienna.

This answer conveys, in fo many words,—" That " his majefty the king of Pruffia had already been " employed for fome time, in all kinds of the most " confiderable preparations for war, and the most K 2 " difquieting, ⁶ difquieting, with regard to the public tranquility; ⁶ when on the 26th of laft month, that prince had ⁶ thought fit to order explanations to be demanded ⁶ of her majefty, the empress queen, upon the mili-⁶ tary dispositions that were making in her domi-⁶ nions, and which had not been resolved upon, till ⁶ after all the preparations which his pruffian majefty ⁶ had already made.

" That thefe were facts known to all Europe.

"That her majefty the empress queen, might there-"fore have declined giving explanations upon objects which did not require them; that however fhe had been pleafed to do it, and to declare with her own mouth to M. Klinggrafe, in the audience fhe granted him on the 26th of july, "That the critical flate of public affairs made her

"That the critical flate of public affairs made her "look upon the meafures which fhe was taking, as "neceffary for her fafety, and that of her allies; and that in other refpects they did not tend to the prejudice of any one.

"That her majefty the empress queen had un-"doubtedly a right to form what judgments the "pleafed on the circumftances of the times; and that "it belonged likewife to none but herfelf to effimate "her dangers.

"That befides her declaration was fo clear, that "fire never could have imagined it could be thought "otherwife.

"That being accuftomed to receive as well as to practife, the attentions that fovereigns owe to each other, fhe could not hear, without aftonifhment and the jufteft fenfibility, the contents of the memorial prefented by M. Klinggrafe the 20th inftant, an account of which had been laid before her.

"That this memorial was fuch, both as to the matter, and the expressions, that her majesty the empress queen, would find herfelf under a necessity of transgreffing the bounds of that moderation, which which the had prefcribed to herfelf, were the to anfiver the whole of its contents."

But yet in anfwer to it, fhe was pleafed that M. Klinggrafe fhould be further acquainted,

"That the informations which had been given to his pruffian majefty, of an offenfive alliance, againft him, between her majefty the emprefs queen, and her majefty the emprefs of Ruffia; as alfo, all the circumftances and pretended flipulations of the faid alliance, were abfolutely falfe and invented; and that no fuch treaty againft his pruffian majefty did exift, or ever had exifted.

"That this declaration would enable all Europe to judge of what weight and quality the dreadful events are, which M. Klinggrafe's memorial announces; and let them fee, that, in all events, they can never be imputed to her majefty the emprefs queen."

Such was the answer of the court of Vienna, to the king of Pruffia, as incongruous as it was infufficient; and as to the matters of fact, which relate to his pruffian majefty's measures, nothing is fo far from truth as what the empress queen advances. Those facts which that court would have to be looked upon, as known to all Europe, are fo different from what it declares them to be, that it will be neceffary, for the reader's instruction, to fet that affair in a clear light. Upon the ruffian armament in the month of june, the king of Pruffia caufed four regiments to pais out of his electorate into Pomerania; and gave orders that his fortresses should be put into a state of defence ; this, and a few other very trifling movements is what gave fo great umbrage to the court of Vienna, that an army of above 80,000 men was ordered to affemble in Bohemia and Moravia. If the emprefs had detached troops out of Bohemia into Tuscany, would the king of Pruffia have had room for apprehenfions for Silefia, and for affembling a numerous army there ? From this it is plain, that the march of the four re-K 3 giments giments to Pomerania, only ferved the court of V₁enna as a pretext to palliate her ill intentions.

On his pruffian majefty's hearing of the great military preparations carrying on in Bohemia, he ordered three regiments of foot, which had been in quarters in Westphalia, towards Halberstadt; but did not fend a fingle regiment into Silefia; the troops remained quiet in their garrifons, without even horfes, and the other neceffaries for an army which is to encamp, or which has defigns of invafion. During this time the court of Vienna continuing, on one hand, to hold the language of peace, and, on the other, to take the most ferious measures for war; not content with these demonstrations, caufed another camp to be marked out, near a town, named Hotzenplotz, fituated on a fpot, belonging indeed to them, but which lies directly between the fortreffes of Neiffe and Cofel; and prepared a great army in Bohemia to occupy the camp of Jaromers, within four miles of Silefia. Thefe motions of the court of Vienna obliged the king of Prussia to confider his own fafety, especially, as it was reafonable to fufpect the defigns of that court, who he knew was not altogether very well intentioned towards him : wherefore he thought it high time to make the difpositions which his fafety and dignity required ; he gave orders for his army to provide themfelves with horfes, and to be in readinefs to march.

Had his pruffian majefty formed any defign in prejudice to the emprefs queen, every one who is at all acquainted with the formidable power of that monarch, muft be fenfible, that he would have had it in his power to execute them many months before the time in queftion, and not having ftaid for her affembling fuch formidable forces for her defence. But that monarch was negotiating whilft his enemies were arming. Such is the manifest weaknefs of the principal foundation, whereon all the arguments of the authrian court, are founded. But this is not the only paffage of the empress queen's answer that shows such a formed design of equivocating in her negotiations,—she mentions her fo clear declaration to M. Klinggrafe. This declaration, though called so clear, is certainly on the whole, unintelligible, who are the allies of the empress, that were threatened with war? Was it the court of France? Or that of Russia? One muss be ftrangely blinded, to attribute to his prussian majesty a design of attacking either of these two courts, and such an enterprize, would furely require fomewhat more than four regiments being sent into Pomerania. The court of Vienna, in this memorial, fay, they did not intend to attack any body; might not they as easily have faid, that they would not attack the king of Prussian of the sent set of the set of the set of the set of the set of Prussian of the set of Prussian the set of the

But the article in this memorial, on which the court of Vienna infifted moft, in her anfwer, was, her alliance with Ruffia, the flipulations of which, as they faid, were abfolutely falfe and invented. To be fure it was very eafy for the auftrian minifters to deny this convention; but befides the facts which were pubblifhed about it, there were circumftances which feemed fufficiently to indicate, at leaft a concert. In the beginning of june, the ruffian troops approached the frontiers of Pruffia. An army of 70,000 men was formed in Livonia, at the fame time that they were preparing at Vienna to affemble a ftrong army in Bohemia, which was to appear there under the name of an army of obfervation. Thefe inftances, befides many more that might be produced, was it neceffary, are fufficient to fhow in the cleareft light, the defigns of the court of Vienna.

In fhort, it plainly appears, that count Kaunitz propofed to fhut the door against all means of explaining and conciliating matters; and, at the fame time, to purfue the preparations of his dangerous defigns, in the expectation that the king of Pruffia, would be fo far provoked, as to take fome flep, K 4 which which might ferve to make him pass for the aggreffor.

The conduct of the court of Drefden fquared exactly with that of Vienna; under the feigned character of a neutral power, count Brühl refolved, that his country fhould be equally forward with his allies, in their defigns againft his pruffian majefty. It is eafy to judge of this, by the counfel, which count Fleming gives count Brühl, in his difpatch of the 14th of july. "To grant the paffage to the pruffian troops; and afterwards to take fuch measures as should be most proper."

By a letter from count Fleming of the 18th of august, the empress queen explained herself to that minister in the following terms:

"That fhe required nothing for the prefent, from the king of Poland, as fhe was very fenfible of his ticklifh fituation; that however, fhe hoped he would, in the mean while, put himfelf in a good pofture, in order to be prepared at all events; and that, in cafe any breach fhould happen between her majefty and the king of Prufila, fhe would, in time, not be averfe to concur, in cafe of need, in the neceffary meafures for their mutual fecurity."

But not to detain the reader longer than is neceffary, on producing fuch a concatination of facts, to prove that his pruffian majefty was not the aggreffor in those troubles that enfued this train of dark and fecret negociations; it evidently appears, that the faxon court had a fhare in all the dangerous defigns which were formed against that monarch;—their ministers were the authors, and chief promoters of them;—and though they did not formally accede to the treaty of Petersburg, they had however agreed with their allies to fuspend their concurrence therein, till fuch time only, as the king's forces should be weakened and divided, and they might pull off the mask without danger.

The king of Poland had adopted as a principle, that any war, between the king of Pruffia and one of his polifh majefty's allies, furnished him with a title to make conquests upon Prussia. And it was in confequence of this principle, that he thought he could, in time of peace, make a partition of the dominions of his neighbour.

Count Brühl entered very eagerly into the plot with the court of Vienna, by the injurious reports he undertook to propagate :—and I think I have made it appear very clearly, that there was a fecret concert exifting between the courts of Vienna and Saxony; in confequence of which, the latter did intend to let the king's army pafs, in order to act afterwards, according to events, either in joining his enemies, or in making a diversion in his dominions, upprovided with troops.

Such were the defigns of the fecret enemies of his majefty the king of Prufila; and in fuch a caufe, let any man put himfelf in that monarch's place, would he not have drawn upon himfelf an everlafting reproach, in the opinion of all equitable and impartial judges; would he not have rendered himfelf accountable to all his pofterity; if he had not made ufe of every expedient, that divine and human laws had put in his power, to prevent, in good time, those defigns, that tended to deprive him of the greates part of his dominions, and to plunge him into absolute deftruction.

For an inftance of the bad defigns of Saxony, we need but confider the warlike preparations made in that country, at the fame time that her majefty the emprefs queen was doing the fame in Bohemia and Moravia; large magazines were every where formed, and the king of Poland refolved to put himfelf at the head of his army, and poft himfelf in the moft advantageous manner for facilitating his junction with the auftrian army in Bohemia : an immenfe road was cut through the mountains of Bohemia, and marked at certain diftances with pofts bearing this remarkable infcription THE MILITARY ROAD; all thefe are fo many circumftances, that completely open the defigns

of the court of Saxony to a full view. This new MILITARY ROAD, in particular, could never furely have been made in order to facilitate the paffage of the pruffian army; and those posts, which actually remain to this day, are so many speaking proofs of the concert, which had long been forming between the courts of Vienna and Saxony, and were but too ftrong a justification of the reasons his pruffian majesty had to prevent the effects of it, Before I proceed to trace that monarch in the

Before I proceed to trace that monarch in the measures which he thought it neceffary, in this conjuncture, to take; I shall, for the reader's affistance, in recollecting precifely all that train of negociation between the courts of Vienna, Drefden, and Peterfburg, just curforily recapitulate these affairs in as short a compass as possible; and then proceed in giving an account of the military affairs in this part of the world, which drew the attention of all Europe.

In the first place, he is to remember, that the empress queen having ceded Silesia to the king of Prussia, by the treaties of Breslau and Dresden, soon began to envy that monarch the poffeffion of fo valuable a part of her former dominions. The defire of repof-feffing herfelf of that country, and of revenging herfelf against the king of Pruffia, induced her to attempt at any rate to gratify those two favourite de-fires; but fearful of the power and enterprising genius of the pruffian monarch, fhe, although fuperior in her forces, fought for fome ally to join with her, in these ambitious defigns : she cast her eyes on the elector of Saxony, king of Poland, who answered her with all poffible cordiality, and fimilitude of notions : these two powers formed a fecret concert, and invited the empress of Russia to accede to the same defign; that princefs was more cautious, and as fhe had not at that time the least glimpse of dispute with the king of Pruffia, was not fo eafily drawn into the scheme. The courts of Vienna and Dresden finding this difficulty, contrived and propagated a thouland calumnies ealumnies, tending to depreciate that monarch, and infufed intimations to the emprefs of Ruffia of many bad defigns formed by Pruffia againft her; and in time, by this means, and by gaining over feveral of the emprefs's minifters to their party, they perfuaded her to come fully into their iniquitous fchemes, which concluded in the treaty of Peterfburg, between the court of Vienna and Peterfburg: Saxony by reafon of her fituation fo much in the power of Pruffia, was excufed from formally acceding to this treaty before matters were brought to fuch a crifis, as fhe might do it without any great danger to herfelf. By this treaty, the emprefs queen was entitled to retake poffion of Silefia, in cafe his pruffian majefty fhould attack her, or any one of her allies, or even the republic of Poland.

The plan for the part which Saxony was to take in the war, which was inevitably to follow; was, in cafe Pruffia demanded at any time a passage for his troops through that electorate, in his way to the dominions of the empress queen, in fuch case to grant that demand; and, as foon as his pruffian majefty fhould have his hands full in Bohemia, or elfewhere, to march with all the forces of the electorate, into the very heart of the pruffian dominions, which would then be deflitute of forces for their defence. The better to enfure fuccess in these measures, the empress of Russia made immense preparations for the sublisting an army of 120,000 men, which, by the treaty of Petersburg, were to march against Prussia. The empress queen in Bohemia and Bavaria, on the frontiers of Silefia, formed camps of 80,000 men, and the whole face of those countries wore the appearance of an approaching war. The king of Poland, elector of Saxony, on his part affembled an army, in his electorate, of 30,000 men, and formed maga-zines for their fubfiltence; and cut an immenfe road through the mountains into Bohemia; and called it the MILITARY ROAD.

Such

Such were the preparations and measures of his pruffian majefty's enemies, when he thought it not fafe to continue any longer without being certain that they were not defigned against him. He accordingly ordered his minister plenlpotentiary at the imperial court, to demand against whom these great preparations were making; but receiving an equivocating answer, he again demanded a folemn promise of the empress that she would not attack him in the courfe of this year, or the next; but being alfo refufed a catagorical answer, and having good intelli-gence of all the above particulars, and the bad defigns of his enemies; he very justly thought that it would be inexcufable in him not to avert the blow, which hung in fo formidable a manner over his head, by ftriking at the bofom of his enemy, to difable him from executing the bad defigns he had formed. Such was the cafe of his pruffian majefty; and all Europe must allow, that he was at liberty to attack any of the three powers in confederacy againft, him without violating in the leaft degree, the laws of nations: and although, he began hoftilities, yet his enemies were the aggreffors * in the war.

Whoever prevents these aggreffions, may commit hostilities; but is not the aggreffor. — In the fucceffion war, when the troops of Savoy were in the french army in Lombardy, the duke of Savoy made a treaty with the emperor against France :— the french difarmed these troops, and carried the war into Piedmont :— it was therefore the duke of Savoy, who was the aggreffor; and the french, who committed the first hostilities.— The league of Cambray was an aggreffion :— if the Venetians had, then, prevented their enemies, they would have committed the first hostilities; but they would not have been the aggreffors.

H IS majefty the king of Pruffia, clearly forefeeing that a war was inevitable, and that a paffage through Saxony was abfolutely neceffary for his army, ordered M. de Malzahn, his minister at the court of Drefden, to demand such a passage. On the 29th of august, he accordingly demanded a private audience of the king of Poland, and made the following verbal declaration to his majesty, on the part of the king his master :

"His majelty the king of Prufia finds himfelf obliged, by the behaviour of the emprefs queen to attack her, and to march through the territories of Saxony into Bohemia: he accordingly demands a paffage through the electoral dominions of his polifh majefty, declaring, that he will caufe his troops to obferve the ftricteft difcipline, and take all the care of the country that the circumftances will permit. His polifh majefty, and his royal family, may at the fame time depend upon being in perfect fafety, and of having the greateft refpect paid them, on the part of his pruffian majefty. As to the reft, after reflecting upon the events of the year 1744, there is no reafon reafon to be furprifed, that the king of Pruffia fhould take fuch meafures, as may prevent a return of what then happened. Moreover, he defires nothing fo much as a fpeedy re-eftablifhment of peace, in order to give him the happy opportunity, of reftoring the king of Poland to the quiet poffeffion of his dominions, against which he has not, in other refpects, formed any dangerous defigns."

M. de Malzahn added, "That the neceffity which the king his mafter was under of acting in this manner, could only be imputed to the calamity of the times, and the behaviour of the court of Vienna."

The king of Poland, in the furprife which this declaration threw him into, anfwered M. de Malzahn, "That he fhould not have expected a requifition in the form that it had juft been made to him; that being at peace with all the world, and under no engagement relative to the prefent object with any of the powers actually at war, or those about to enter into it, he could not conceive the end of making fuch a declaration; but that he fhould give answer upon this fubject in writing, and hoped his prufian majefty, contenting himfelf with a quick paffage, would neither forget the respect due to a fovereign, nor that which all the members of the germanic body reciprocally owe to each other."

Soon after this verbal anfwer, the king caufed another to be delivered in writing to M. de Malzahn, which imported much the fame as the other, but was more explicit.

Befides lord Stormont, the britifh minifter, who went on the part of the king of Poland, to wait on the king of Pruffia, his polifh majefty likewife fent the count de Salmont, one of his minifters. His pruffian majefty received them very politely, heard their propofals, and told them, " That he himfelf wifhed for nothing more than to find the king of Poland's fentiments acquiefce with his declarations : that the neutrality which his polifh majefty feemed defirous defirous to obferve, was exactly what he required of him; but that in order to render this neutrality more feeure, and lefs liable to variation, it would be proper for his polifh majefty to feparate his army; and fend the troops he had affembled at Pirna back into their quarters; that a ftep of this nature would be a full proof of a neutrality not to be doubted off; and that after this he fhould take a pleafure, in fhewing by an equal condefection, his difpofition to give real marks of his friendfhip for his polifh majefty, and concert with him what meafures might be proper to be taken, according to the fituation of affairs."

But to comply with these terms was not the defign of his polish majesty; he had raised an army of 30,000 men for other exploits, than to march back again into their quarters. As to his prussion majesty, foreseeing that war was become inevitable, and that the king of Poland, by his actions, was resolved to continue his military preparations; at last resolved to enter Saxony, and by striking fo effectual a blow, diffenable his enemies from executing the formidable fcheme they had projected.

This great monarch having prepared with the utmost diligence, a powerful army, found it ready for action by the end of august. His fituation at this critical conjuncture was alarming; the power of the house of Austria, of itself an overmatch for him; he knew he had to cope with besides a vast army of ruffians, who were upon their march for Prussia; add to these, the king of Poland, at the head of 30,000 men; nor was his majest without fears from the part which France might take, in the fituation which her new ally the empress queen then was in.

But, being prepared for the worft that could happen, he refolved to begin hoftilities by attacking Saxony; having firft conferred the chief command in Pruffia, on marfhal Lehwald, an officer of the greateft courage and abilities; and that in Silefia, on marfhal Schwerin, a foldier grown old in the pruffian fervice, and

and a particular favourite of the king's, having taught his majefty the first rudiments of the art of war; referving to himself that of the principal army, intended to act in Saxony and Bohemia.

The faxon general had made choice of the post of Pirna, for the rendezvous of their troops, as the most convenient, either for deceiving the pruffian army, in cafe of its advancing into Bohemia, or for receiving fuccours from the auftrians. Upon the first motion of the pruffian troops, for marching into Pomerania, or, in cafe of neceffity, for joining marfhal Lehwald, the faxons abandoned all their garrifons bordering on Brandenburg, and took poft between the Moldaw and the Elbe. They afterwards returned to their quarters; and, a fecond time, broke up and repaired to their respective cantonments. The motive on which they acted being known, proper measures were taken ; and the king of Pruffia, entering Saxony on the 29th of august, marched with his troops, divided into three columns, towards Pirna. The first fet out from the duchy of Magdeburg; under the command of prince Ferdinand of Brunfwic, directing their route to Leipfic, Borna, Kemnitz, Freyberg, Dippoldswalde, to Cotta. The fecond command by the king, and under him field marshal Kieth, marched through Pretsch, Torgau, Lonmatich, Wilfdruff, Dreiden, and Zehift. The third commanded by the prince of Brunfwick Bevern, croffing Lufatia, took its route through Elfterwerde, Bautzen, Stolpe, to Lohmm. These three columns arrived the fame day at the camp at Pirna, which they invefted. The division, commanded by the king, took poffeffion of Drefden, and cut off all communication between that city and the faxon camp; and on the 8th his majefty took up his quarters at Wilfdruff. On the 10th, a great part of the pruffian army marched in order towards the faxon camp, and the head quarters were placed at Seidlitz, not much above half a german mile diftant from from Pirna. And the fame day one regiment of cuiraffiers, and three of dragoons, marched through Drefden into the camp at Wilfdruff, where a body of 16000 men were ftill left.

The division under prince Ferdinand of Brunswic, amounting to about 15000 men, entered Leipsic on the 20th. And so impenetrable are the councils of his prussian majesty, that even prince Ferdinand, when he set out upon his march, did not know what course he was to take further than Gros-Kugel, where, upon opening his instructions, he found the king's orders to advance to Leipsic, and take possession of it.

Notice was given the fame evening to the deputies of the corporation of merchants, that they were to pay all taxes and cuftoms only to the order of his prufian majefty; the deputies waited on prince Ferdinand of Brunfwic, next morning at 11 o'clock, who received them very politely, and repeated to them, that from that day, all contributions were to be paid to the order of the king of Pruffia, and not to his polifh majefty; and affured them that they might depend upon his friendfhip, protection, and care to maintain good order. The fame day the prince took poffeffion of the cuftom-houfe and excife-office; and ordered the magazines of corn and meal to be opened for the ufe of his troops.

Whilft his highneis prince Ferdinand transacted these affairs in so resolute a manner at Leipsic, his majesty the king of Prussia did the fame at Dresden. The king of Poland, on the news of the irruption of the prussians, left his capital, the city of Dresden, attended by his two fons, prince Zavier, and prince Charles, on the 3d of september, and put himself at the head of his troops, encamped at Pirna, resolving to defend himself to the last. The queen, and the rest of the royal family, remained in the city, and were treated in the most polite manner by the king of Prussia, who took possible of it the 8th. That monarch established all the offices for the execution of L public public bufinefs belonging to the pruffian army, at Torgau, which was the place where contributions and duties of all kinds were paid : and as the cafh and treafure of the army were kept here, 1500 peafants were fet at work to throw up entrenchments round the place, to prevent its being attacked or furprifed. The deputies from Leipfic were conducted hither, and detained as a fecurity for the obedience of the regency of that city, and the payment of its duties and contributions. A pruffian commiffary was left to take care of thefe payments, but what is extraordinary, not one foldier.

I have already obferved, that the three columns of the pruffian army met at Pirna the fame day. They were no fooner encamped round this poft, than it was perceived, that notwithftanding the inferiority of the faxon army, the advantageous fituation of the ground it poffefied, was fo great, that it was not to be attacked without confiderable lofs. It was therefore determined to turn the attack into a blockade, and to treat the faxon army rather in the manner of a town befieged, than like a poft, which might be attacked according to the cuftom of war carried on in an open country.

The fituation of the faxon camp, which made it almoft impregnable, was as follows, viz. The plain between Pirna and Koenigftein, where the faxon camp was pitched, is a continued rock, with a diclivity down to the Elbe on one fide, and into a valley on the other. This declivity ends on one fide of Koenigftein, from whence begins a thick foreft, in which the faxons cut down trees, and barricaded themfelves. On this fide of Pirna is a narrow paffage, where, as well as in the town itfelf, they made intrenchments, and raifed in and about their camp, near 60 redoubts, which were well provided with a great number of cannon. But this advantageous fituation did not remedy the want of water, provifions, and forage; the faxon generals omitted nothing that might induce the pruffians to proceed on their march for Bohemia, and leave them behind, without attacking them. But former experience had given the king of Pruffia wifdom, with regard to future transactions. If, on the one hand, no direct attack was thought advife- . able; fo, on the other, no enemy was to be left behind. Befides ftrictly blockading the faxons, it was alfo refolved to form an army of obfervation, to prevent any fuccours being fent from the austrian army. In confequence of this refolution, the pruffians took poffeffion of the pofts of Leopoldshain, Marckerf-dorf, Hellendorf, Cotta, Zehist, Sedlitz, as far as the Elbe, where, by their bridge, they had a communication with the posts of Lohmm, Welen, Obrefwaden, and Schandau. In thefe different places were distributed thirty-eight battalions, and thirty fquadrons. Seventy-nine battalions and feventy fquadrons, were deftined for Bohemia, which entered by detachments, moving to Peterfwalde, Aufig, and Jonfdorf. This body was commanded by marshal Keith, by whose orders general Manstein made himself master of the castle of Ketschen, taking an hundred auftrians prifoners. The marshal en-camped at Jonsdorf, where he staid till the end of the month.

Hitherto marshal Brown had kept close in his camp at Kolin; which was almost completely form-ed by the 21st of august, most of the artillery for that purpose being arrived ; but the troops were not all complete then; the marshal had under him prince Piccolomini, feven lieutenant field marshals, and fixteen major generals; befides this, the auftrians were then affembling troops at Ollischau. The court of Vienna drew all the forces of her imperial majefty's immense dominions, into Bohemia : all the officers in the austrian Netherlands received orders to join their regiments directly, and hold themfelves in readinels to march on the first notice, and were very foon detached into Bohemia; and orders arrived at L 2 Bruffels.

Bruffels, to raife feveral independent companies of 100 men each : parties of 5 or 6000 croatians were continually marching through Vienna for their camps in Bohemia and Moravia.

Marshal Schwerin, as I before observed, was appointed by his pruffian majefty to command in Silefia; that general, after paffing through the county of Glatz, had advanced to Nachot, afterwards to the banks of the Mettaw, and laftly to Aujet, where he routed a detachment of huffars, and dragoons, commanded by general Bucof, and took 200 prifon-Afterwards the marshal took poffession of the ers. camp of Aujeft, and foraged under the walls of Konigfgratz, where prince Piccolomini was encamped. Near Hoenmaut the prussian hussars defeated 400 austrian dragoons, and took many of them in their flight. This was all marshal Schwerin could do. The camp at Koningfgratz was fituated at the conflux of the Adler into the Elbe: the enemy were entrenched, and this post in its front too difficult to be attacked.

When his pruffian majefty took poffeffion of Drefden, he fent an officer to the queen to demand the keys of the cabinets, the archieves, and treafures of her hufband : her majefty unwillingly complied ; and when the pruffian officer received the keys of her, he requested further, that her majesty would also put him in poffeffion of a certain cafket, containing fome particular papers, and described it to her : the queen . denied having any knowledge of fuch a cafket, and told the officer she knew not what he meant. Madam, replied he, (pointing to a cabinet) the cafket I am ordered by my master to demand, is in that cabinet .- The queen in fome confussion affured him, he was mistaken, for the cabinet contained no fuch papers. But the pruffian officer infifted upon having it opened, and finding that the most peremptory demands would not be complied with, by her polish majesty, he broke it open himself in her prefence, prefence, and took out the very cafket he had demanded, and which contained all the original conventions, and letters which paffed between the courts ' of Saxony, Vienna, and Peterfburg.

His pruffian majefty finding himfelf poffeffed of fo invaluable a treasure, inftantly published them, that all Europe might be convinced of the necessity there was for his beginning hostilities in his own defence.

Great efforts were only to be made in Saxony; the fituation of the faxon camp, made it neceffary for the austrians to advance to their relief, and the pruffians found it necessary to keep these enemies off, as well as to continue the blockade of the faxon camp in the closeft manner. The condition of the electorate was certainly at this time on the verge of deftruction, the pruffians had taken poffeffion of all the towns and fortreffes, and had demanded about a fortnight after their entrance, to be delivered in the space of three weeks at farthest, 1100 oxen, 2500 sheep, 200,000 measures of oats, 150,000 quintals of hay, and 20,000 truffes of ftraw; the value of them all was fuppofed to amount to 625,000 crowns.

In the mean time the empress queen, found herself obliged in honour, to relieve her ally the king of Poland; accordingly the ordered marshal Brown to difengage the faxons. His army was encamped at Budin, near the conflux of the Egra with the Elbe; and for the executing these orders, he had the choice of three ways; one by attacking and defeating marshal Keith's army, which was no easy task : the fecond, by marching to the left, through Belin, and Teoplitz, to enter Saxony, which laid him under the neceffity of exposing his flank to the pruffian army, and even of being deprived of his magazines at Budin and Welfern : the third, by fending a detachment through Leutmeritz; and proceeding to the faxons by the way of Böhmifch, Leipe and Schandau. This last measure could not produce any thing decisive; the ground in the neighbourhood of Schandau, and L 3 of troops may ftop an entire army. But his pruffian majefty, in fo critical a time, judged his prefence was neceffary in Bohemia. Accordingly, he left the camp at Setlitz, on the 28th of feptember, and the fame day reached marshal Keith's camp at Jonsdorf. On the 29th, the army in Bohemia was ordered to march : the king going before with eight battalions and twenty fquadrons, encamped at Jirmitz, where the fcouts of the army brought advice, that marshal Brown was, the next day, to pass the Egra. His majefty now judged, that the beft way was to draw near the enemy; in order to obferve all their motions. On the 30th, all the troops followed the king in two, colums, the one by the way of Profcobot, and the other by the way of Jirmitz. From Jirmitz he marched with his van, towards Welmina, where he arrived that evening, an hour before funfet. There he faw the auftrian army, with its right wing at Lowoschutz, and its left towards the Egra. That evening the king, himfelf, occupied, with fix battalions, a hollow, and fome rifing grounds, which commanded Lowoschutz, and which he resolved to make use of, the next day, in order to march out against the austrians. The army arrived, at night, at Welmina, where the king only formed his battalions behind one another, and the fquadrons in the fame manner, which remained all night in this polition; the king himself litting. up all night, and having no other covering but his cloak, before a little fire, at the head of his troops. On the first of october, at break of day, he took with him his principal general officers, and fhewed them the ground he intended to occupy with his army; viz. the infantry forming the first line, to occupy two high hills, and the bottom betwixt them; fome battalions to form the fecond line; and the third to be composed of the whole cavalry. The ground where the pruffians formed themfelves in order of battle, contained only the fix battalions of the van, the ground ground continuing to widen towards the left. The declivity of these mountains was covered with vineyards, divided into a great many inclosures, by ftone walls, three feet high, as belonging to different perfons. In these vineyards, marshal Browne posted his pandours to ftop them, fo that, as every battalion of the left entered the line, it was obliged to engage the enemy. But their fire being faint and unfteady, it confirmed his pruffian majefty in his opinion, that marfhal Browne was retreated, and that the pandours and bodies of cavalry feen in the plain were his rear. This opinion appeared the more plaufible, from the im-poffibility of feeing any appearance of an army; a thick fog hiding every thing, and did not difperfe till paft eleven. His majefty ordered his artillery to play on the cavalry in the plain, upon which it feveral times altered its form. Sometimes it appeared numerous; fometimes drawn up chequer-ways; fometimes drawn up in three contiguous lines; fometimes five or fix troops filed off to the left, and difappeared. After the king had found that the battalions were poffeffed of the hollow, in the manner he had ordered it, he thought, that the first thing to be done, was to drive back the enemy's cavalry, which flood in the front. Accordingly he ordered twenty fquadrons, of horfe to charge them ; who, having formed themfelves at the foot of the eminence, where the pruffian infantry was posted, charged and broke the austrian horfe. But, as the auftrians had placed behind their cavalry in hollow places and ditches, a great body of infantry, with 'feveral pieces of cannon, the pruf-fian cavalry, through the brifknefs of their attack, found themfelves exposed to the fire of this cannon and infantry : which obliged them to return and form again, under the protection of their own infantry and cannon, and this without being purfued by the auftrian cavalry. It was not till now, apprehended, by his pruffian majefty, that the auftrians were facing him with their whole army. The king at that time L4

was

was for placing his cavalry behind in a fecond line; bu: before this order could be brought, his horfe, prompted by their natural impetuofity, and a defire of diffinguishing themselves, charged a second time, bore down all opposition, passed through the same flank fire, as at the first charge, pursued the enemy above 300 paces; and, in the excess of ardour, crossed a ditch 10 feet wide. Beyond this ditch, at the di-flance of 300 paces was another; behind which ap-peared the auftrian infantry, drawn up in order of battle. Immediately 60 pieces of cannon played upon the pruffian horfe, which therefore repaffed the ditch, and returned to their infantry, at the foot of the mountain, without being followed. The king then ordered his cavalry to post themselves behind the in-fantry. About this time, the fire on the left wing began to increase. Marshal Brown had succesfively brought on 20 battalions, who, paffing by Lowofchutz, lined the banks of the Elbe, to support the pandours in the vineyards; and the enemy used all possible efforts to flank the left of the pruffian infantry, the king perceived the neceffity of fupporting it, and ordered the battalions of the first line to turn to the left; the battalions of the fecond line filled up the intervals, which had been occafioned by this motion ; fo that the cavalry formed the fecond line, which fupported the infantry. At the fame time the whole left of the infantry, marching on gradually, wheeled about, and attacked the town of Lowoschutz in flank, in spite of the prodigious fire of the enemy : the pruffian grenadiers fired in through the doors and windows, and roofs of the houses, in the burning of which, the battalion of Kleist and Bornstadt chiefly diftinguished themselves. In this action, though only the attack of a post, every prussian foldier of the left wing fired ninety shot. They had no more powder nor ammunition for their cannon; notwithstanding which, the regiment of Itzenblitz and Manteufel entered Lowofchutz, with their their bayonets fixed, and drove before them nine fresh austrian battalions, which marshal Brown had just posted there. The battle concluded with a diforderly flight of the auftrians. What hindered the pruffian cavalry from taking advantage of it was, first, the broad ditch mentioned in describing the fecond gallant attack made by them; and fecondly, the masterly disposition of marshal Brown, in taking all the left of his infantry, which had not been attacked, to cover his broken troops which were flying in the utmost confusion. In this order marshal Brown waited the approach of night to retreat. At an hour after midnight he began his march towards his camp at Budin, breaking down all his bridges over the Egra. The next day, the prince of Bevern was detached by the king of Prussia, with a body of 8000 men to Schirkowitz, which was on their right; and from thence he fent out parties along the Egra, to reconnoitre the paffes. The auftrian army amounted to 60,000 before the battle, which lasted feven hours, during which, the cannonading was inceffant on both fides. The lofs of the auftrians was computed at about 7000 men killed or wounded; 500 taken prifoners; amongst whom was prince Lobkowitz, four pieces of cannon, and three standards. The loss of the pruffians did not exceed 6 or 7000, among whom was general Ludritz, an officer of great merit and experience. The pruffian army encamped on the field of battle, where it continued without molestation, foraging within cannon-fhot of the auftrian army.

On the 6th, his pruffian majefty received advice that marfhal Brown had made a detachment, in which was his own regiment; and that thefe troops had moved to Raudnitz, and were advancing towards Bohmifchleipe, in their way for Saxony, and confifted of about 6000 men. Although the weaknefs of this detachment could caufe little apprehenfion, his majefty thought that his army in Saxony, confifting only of thirty fquadrons, might want a reinforcement of horfe; efpecially especially if the faxons should attempt to force the pass of the Hellendorf, where the cavalry might be usefully employed, particularly in the plains of Peterswalde. These confiderations determined the king to go thither in person. - Accordingly, setting out from Lowoschutz, on the 13th, with 15 squadrons of dragoons, he arrived at his other army, on the 14th at noon.

The reader may now perceive that the battle of Lowoschutz was not entirely decisive. For although his prussian majesty, in the account which he published of this campaign, pretends, that his army in Bohemia was intended merely to cover the blockade of the faxon camp; yet we may perceive that his in-tention, when he fet out for Bohemia, was, in cafe he got a decifive victory, to march directly to Prague, to facilitate the conquest of all that kingdom: every impartial man, will, I believe, agree, that this mo-narch, had he gained such a victory as I am speaking of, would not have directly marched back to this army in Saxony; his bufinefs would in every refpect have been more completely done, had he got poffeffion of Prague and thereby been enabled to extend his winter-quarters into the very heart of Bohemia. But I would not be thought from hence to derogate from the real greatness of this victory, although disputed by the auftrians, that his pruffian majefty gained it; we may find by marshal Brown's inability to relieve the faxons, on which account he engaged the pruffian army; and the advantage the victor's caufe received, from it, was very confiderable; it was the first action of the war, and the foldiers looked on it as a good omen of future fuccess. His prufflan majefty in this victory found the happy effects of that exquifite difcipline to which he had inured his foldiers; the fire of the pruffian foldiers, as well as their artillery was fo extremely heavy and unintermitting, that it was almost impossible for any troops to stand unbroken before it.

In the mean time great changes happened in the camp at Pirna, fince the 10th of october.' The faxons had that day attempted to throw a bridge over the river at Wilftead. The pruffians had there a redoubt, from whence a captain with 50 grenadiers fired on the faxon's boars. He took feven or eight of them, and others he funk with their cannon; fo that the defign of the faxons mifcarried. They now altered their defign, and, feeing the difficulty of transporting their boats on the Elbe, where they had the fire of three pruffian redoubts to pafs, they therefore loaded their pontoons on horfes, and carried them thus by land to a place near Konigstein, opposite to the village of Halbstadtel. This outlet of their camp had excited the attention of the faxons, as being the most easy, on account of the fuccours they expected from the auftrians. For the better understanding of this relation, it will be neceffary to break here the thread of the narrative, in order to defcribe the nature of the ground, which is known to be the basis of military dispositions. The description which I before gave of the post of Pirna, has fhewn its fituation to be very ftrong; but with this defect, that it is as difficult to come out of it as to force it. According to the fituation of the ground, the faxons could attempt to force a paffage only by Hermfdorf and Hellendorf. This would certainly have been attended with great lofs, though there was a probability of faving by this attempt a part, at leaft, of their men. It cannot but be thought, that they were entirely unacquainted with the fituation of Halbstadt, Burgearsdorf Zeigenruck, Schandau, and with the disposition of the prussians in these posts. The pruffian general Zeschwitz, with eleven battalions and fifteen fquadrons, was posted between Schan-dau, and Wendischefere; and opposite to him in the villages of Mitteldorf and Altendorf, encamped marfhal Brown with his detachment. Leschwitz was much ftronger than Brown. The impracticable fituation

ation of these rocks hindered the austrians from advancing to Bugerfdorf. This could not be done without a body double their number, or filing off, two a-breaft, in fight of general Lefchwitz towards Al-ftadt. Where the faxons intended to pafs, is a fmall plain, in the center of which stands Lilienstein, a steep. mountain. On both fides of this rock, in the form of a crefent, five battalions of grenadiers guarded an impracticable barricade of felled trees. Behind. them at the diftance of 500 paces, two brigades. of foot were placed in the defile of Burgersdorf, supported by five squadrons of dragoons; and behind this defile is Ziegenruck, a perpendicular rock, 60 feet high, and which forms a femi-circle round thefe difficult pofts, joining the Elbe, at its two extremi-ties. From this inconvenient place, however, it was, that on the 11th the faxons began to form their bridge. The prussian officers, instead of disturbing them, suffered them to finish it. The descent from Tirmfdorf, towards the Elbe, is tollerable practicable; but, after they had finished their bridge, the great difficuty remained of climbing up the rock, from whence they could go only by one foot-path to Al-ftadtel. It was on the 12th, in the evening, that they began their march. Two battalions of grenadiers, after infinite difficulty, got on the other fide. On the 13th, this road was intirely deftroyed by the continual rains; fo that there was no poffibility of getting their cannon from their entrenchments; and accordingly they left them behind. This day their cavalry, their baggage, and their rear found themfelves confufedly embarraffed, one being ftopped by another. The difficulty of the passage hindered the march of their troops, the van could only file off one by one, whilft the main body and the rear were obliged to remain motionless on the fame place. On the 13th, very early in the morning, prince Maurice of An-halt received the first advice of the retreat of the faxons. The pruffion troops without delay, marched in feven feven columns. It was with great labour they climbed those rocks, during which, however, they met with no opposition. Upon gaining the height, they formed; the pruffian huffars fell upon four faxon fquadrons, which composed their rear-guard, and drove them to their infantry, near Tirmsdorf. The pruffian companies of hunters, lodging themfelves in a wood, on the flank of these troops, extremely galled them with their fire. At the fame time, prince Maurice ordered the foot regiment of Pruffia to advance on an eminence, to the right of the faxons; and two pieces of cannon being brought to play on their rear guard, a general flight enfued. The huffars threw themfelves on the baggage of the army, and plundered it; and the hunters conveyed themfelves into the woods, near the Elbe; from whence they galled the rear guard in its retreat. The faxons now loft all prefence of mind, and cut down their bridge, which was carried away by the current to the poft of Raden, where it was ftopped. The pruffian army encamped on the eminence of Stuppen, its left joining to the Elbe, and the right extending along a large hollow way, terminating near Hennerfdorf. Such were the fituations of the pruffian, auftrian and faxon troops, when the king of Pruffia arrived on the 14th, with his dragoons, at the camp at Struppen.

Marshal Brown had arrived on the 11th, at Lichtensiderf, near Schandau, and immediately acquainted the faxons with his arrival, letting them know, that he would ftay there all the next day, but no longer; and, in the mean time, waited for the notice of a certain fignal, to begin the attack on the prussion posts, which fignal was not given. The faxons were in a cul de fac, or place, through which there was no passage, where it was impossible for them to act, and they laboured under unfurmountable difficulties; fo that, though the king of Poland, who was at Konigstein, was ardent, for making an attack, his generals convinced him of the utter impossibility of it. Marshal Marshal Brown perceiving all the danger of the fituation he was then in, retreated on the 14th towards Bohemia. Whereupon, a pruffian officer, with a body of huffars fell upon the rear of the auftrians, confifting of 300 huffars, and 200 pandours; and, routing them, the hungarian infantry was put to the fword. This affair, which gave rife to fo many debates and reproaches among the auftrian and faxon generals, is very eafily decided; the cafe was, that neither party had a fufficient knowledge of the ground which the faxons had pitched upon for their retreat, and to which alone was owing the furrender of the faxon army. The king of Poland, who was yet in the caftle of Konigstein, seeing his army in such a situation, that it could not force a paffage by the fword, and without all hopes of provisions or fuccours, permitted his troops to furrender themfelves prifoners of war. Count Rutowski was appointed to draw up the capitulation *. The king of Prussia made no difficulty of reftoring the colours, ftandards, and kettledrums, which were carried to the king of Poland at Konigftein. According to the capitulation the faxons marched out of their camp. On the 16th, in the morning, bread was fent to the foldiers, as foon as the capitulation was agreed to. On the 17th they passed the Elbe, preceded by their general officers, at a place called Raden, where the pruffians had a bridge of boats; from thence they marched into a plain in the neighbourhood, and after paffing be-

(158 -)

* His pruffian majefty's anfwer to the 5th article of capitulation, is conceived in those fpirited terms, which the prince was fo wont to use. Rutowski demanded that the life and grenadier guards should be excepted in the capitulation; to which his majefty anfwered, "There is no exception to be made, because it is known "that the king of Poland did give orders for that part of his troops "which is in the faid kingdom to join the ruffians, and to march "for this purpose to the frontiers of Siles and a man must be a "fool to let troops go which he holds fast, to see them make head "against him a second time, and to be obliged to take them prifo-"ners again." tween two battalions of pruffian guards, they were teceived by two battalions of the prince of Pruffia's regiment, drawn up on the right and left; they there formed a hollow fquare, and had the articles of war read, and the military oath adminiftered to them. As there was but one bridge laid over the river, and the roads from the faxon camp were extremely bad; and as every regiment took the oath feparately, this ceremony lafted all that day and the next. The foldiers were all armed, and most of them entered into the fervice of his pruffian majefty, and the officers were permitted on their parole, to go to their places of refidence.

The whole faxon army confifted of 16,000 men, 3000 of which were horfe and dragoons. The foldiers were extremely well looking, robuft young men, and had not fuffered for want of provisions during the blockade of five weeks. But the cavalry was almost ruined.

On the 18th, the king of Poland fet out for Warfaw. The troops of Pruffia were withdrawn from all the places in this road; and the fame regard fhewn to his perfon, as crowned heads reciprocally obferve towards each other, in the most profound peace. The queen of Poland, together with the royal family, continued in their capital; and had the fame honours paid them from their enemies that furrounded them, as they were accustomed to receive from their own fubjects.

It was expected by many, that the king of Pruffia, after gaining fuch an acceffion of ftrength, as the faxon army, would again march into Bohemia, and face marfhal Brown on a more equal footing than before. But that wife monarch, weighing the difadvantages that might accrue to his army by hazarding a winter's campaign, in a country, where the feverity of the weather is generally more deftructive than the most defperate battle; against the advantages that might be gained by a fecond victory, at a feason when it it was impossible to improve it, prudently refolved to withdraw his army into quarters of cantonment, and there to wait the motions of the enemy. Accordingly, marshal Keith was ordered to fend off the baggage of his corps on the 21st of October, the horse and heavy artillery on the 22st; which was accordingly executed.

His prussian majesty left Struppen the 20th, ac-companied with 10 battalions, to cover the retreat of his bohemian army, and lay that night at Peterswalde, and the next at Lenai; on the 22d, in the morning (leaving his battalions at Lenai) went to Lowofchutz, but returned that night to Lenai. On the 23d, early in the morning, the camp at Lowoschutz broke up; they formed into two columns, the first commanded by marshal Keith, the fecond by the prince of Prusfia. Marshal Keith detached four battalions by the banks of the Elbe, to guard the right of the army, and, at the fame time, to pick up the detachments placed along the river : they joined the army at Lenai. The prince of Bevern commanded the rear guard, which confifted of eight battalions, five fquadrons of dragoons, and five of huffars. On the left of the rear of the army, but at fome diftance, was posted part of the regiment of leithen huffars, to prevent the auftrian irregulars from acting; they lay that night at Lenai, the 23d, where they rested the 24th and 25th.

In the mean time, marshal Brown could not well penetrate into the defigns of his pruffian majefty; but thinking it probable, that he was making his dispofitions for retreating, he fent a detachment of 3000 men, under general Haddick, with a defign to harrass the rear of the pruffian army; but he found his pruffian majefty had made fo masterly a disposition, that it was in vain to attack him. He accordingly retired.

That monarch had occupied with his ten battalions all the high grounds about Lenai, and his army continued tinued to retire in perfect fafety, his battalions ftill marching on, and keeping poffeffion of the heights. The army advanced on the 26th to Teutfch Neudorff, encamped there, and the next day to Schoenwalde, and re-entered Saxony on the 30th, where it was cantoned between Pirna and the frontier along the Elbe. General Zaftrow, with his brigade, was pofted at Gifhübel and Gottleube, where he was attacked by the auftrian pandours; but they were repulfed with lofs, and purfued beyond Peterfwalde; after which, difheartened by the warm reception they always met with, they no longer diffurbed the advanced pofts of the pruffian army.

At the fame time the army at Lowofchutz was quitting Bohemia, marshal Schwerin was ordered to return into Silesia. He had passed the Elbe at Jaromitz: and, after procuring all the forage possible, he marched towards Schalitz; to which place fome thousands of hungarians followed him, a body of his troops attacked them, and drove them as far as Smirssiz; after which, he continued his march unmolested. On the 2d of november, he entered the county of Glatz, and put his army into places of cantonment.

His majefty the king of Pruffia, entered Drefden in triumph, on the 21ft of november, accompanied by the princes of his houfe, and feveral general officers, on horfeback, followed by his regiment of lifeguards, and took his refidence at count Brühl's magnificent palace. He rode every day, and immediately on his coming, examined the fortifications of the city, as well as the provision and ammunition, with which it was flored : ten thoufand of his troops were quartered in the city and the neighbouring villages. The number of mouths this occasioned to be at Drefden, enhanced the price of corn fo much, that a bushel of wheat cost five crowns. And what enhanced this fcarcity was, a monopoly, one fingle man having farmed all the mills in Saxony, M and the bakers were all obliged to have their corn ground at these mills; and although three memorials were presented to his polish majesty, requesting a remedy to so great a grievance; yet, such was the inattention of that court to the good of its subjects, that they rejected them, and the mills continued farmed.

The king of Pruffia, during his ftay at Drefden, in order to keep off the enemy's irregular troops from making incurfions into Saxony, ordered ditches to be made ten ells broad, and five deep; and by laying trees acrofs, made a fort of barricade. His majefty alfo ordered the fortifications of his dangers Drefden to be confiderably repaired and

That monart of his pruffian mathe lords of the regisfcovered the unjuft defigns of his prepare quarters ne did as much as the greateft king ment of h/e done, to prevent their execution. He drove his enemy, the king of Poland, out of his hereditary dominions, and took poffeffion of them himfelf, making his whole army prifoners of war. He carried the war into countries belonging to the emprefs queen, and gained a victory over her troops. In the paper war which was carried on between his, and his enemies minifters, at most of the courts in Europe, he was equally victorious. In fhort, his pruffian majefty appeared every where, and conquest always for his attendant.

I fhall conclude this chapter with fome account of field marfhal Keith, fo often mentioned in it. This great man was a native of Scotland, that country having the honour of giving him birth in 1696. He is defeended from one of its moft antient and noble families. He was drawn into the rebellion againft his majefty king George the Ift, in 1715, and behaved with great refolution and bravery, at the battle of Sherriffmuir. At the fupprefision of the rebellion, he went into France, where he fludied mathematics under the celebrated M. de land and her family still refided ; and though a paper war continued at the Hague, and feveral other courts, between the kings of Poland and Pruffia, yet nothing was to be feen at Drefden, but the greatest politeness and complaifance. The king of Pruffia admiring a very fine fet of pictures in the royal palace; her polifh majefty being informed of it, ordered them to be immediately carried to that monarch. On the other hand, nothing was wanting to alleviate the difagreeableness of her present situation. The prussian officers were always prefent at the operas and balls, in the brigade, the which paved the way to feveral marriages He accompaniend her polifh majefty's maids of ho-from the court of fian majefty, whenever any birthduced him into the fervappened, always fent marshal him a commission of brigadier genes, name.

He afterwards commanded an army of 30,000 men near Peterfburg, when the amazing revolution in the ruffian empire was brought about, which placed the empress Elizabeth, daughter of Peter the great, on the throne of Ruffia. that quarter. The french alfo gave out, all over Europe, that they intended marching a formidable army to the affiftance of their ally the empress queen; and the preparations they made on the frontiers of France, indicated fome great defign in hand.

To defend himfelf againft fo formidable a confederacy, this great monarch was obliged to let his own prepartions for war keep pace with those of his enemies. He made levies all over his dominions, that his troops might bear fome equality in number to those of his antagonists. In short, he showed, that his refources encreased in proportion, as his dangers multiplied.

Such was the end of the first campaign in Germany; gloriously finished on the part of his pruffian majefty. He had discovered the unjust designs of his enemies, and he did as much as the greatest king could have done, to prevent their execution. He drove his enemy, the king of Poland, out of his hereditary dominions, and took possible of them himfelf, making his whole army prisoners of war. He carried the war into countries belonging to the empress queen, and gained a victory over her troops. In the paper war which was carried on between his, and his enemies ministers, at most of the courts in Europe, he was equally victorious. In sprussion majefty appeared every where, and conquest always for his attendant.

I fhall conclude this chapter with fome account of field marfhal Keith, fo often mentioned in it. This great man was a native of Scotland, that country having the honour of giving him birth in 1696. He is defeended from one of its moft antient and noble families. He was drawn into the rebellion against his majesty king George the Ist, in 1715, and behaved with great resolution and bravery, at the battle of Sherriffmuir. At the fuppression of the rebellion, he went into France, where he studied mathematics under the celebrated M, de M. de Maupertius; he also made himself perfect mafter of the military part of geometry. From Paris he fet out on his travels into Italy, Spain, Portugal, and Switferland. On his return to that city, the czar of Muscovy, who was then at Paris, invited him to enter into his fervice, which Mr. Keith then refused, He was a volunteer in the french army at the ftorming the harbour of Vigo, in the year 1719, when he received a dangerous wound. From Paris he went to the court of Madrid, where, by the interest of the duke of Liria, he obtained a commission in the irish brigade, then commanded by the duke of Ormond: He accompanied the duke of Liria, in his embaffy from the court of Spain, to Muscovy, which introduced him into the fervice of the czarina, who gave him a commission of brigadier general, and soon after, that of lieutenant general, and was invested with the order of the black eagle. In this quality he ferved under count Munich against the turks, commanding a body of 8000 men, at the fiege of Oczakow, with great reputation, and receiving a wound in the thigh, for the cure of which he made a journey from Peterfburgh to Paris; as foon as he recovered he came over to London, and was very well received by his britannic majefty, who knew that he was forced into the rebellion, by a bigotted mother. Stockholm; and foon after created him field marshal in the ruffian armies. But taking fome difgust to the ruffian fervice, whose pay is very small, he entered into the fervice of his pruffian majesty, who received him in the most gracious manner, made him governor of Berlin, and a field marshal in the pruffian armies; enjoying a large revenue, and the most gracious treatment from the king of Pruffia. The first occafion for a display of his abilities, in the fervice of his new master, was the invasion of Saxony by that monarch: and of which I have just been endeavouring to prefent the reader with a clear and distinct view. His genius in the art of war, will appear more fully in the fubsequent transactions.

No part of hiftory is fo extremely difficult to write, as that which prefents us with an account of the transactions performed in our own time. It is almost impossible entirely to dispel the cloud of obfcurity which cover the motives, and fecret springs that occasion many remarkable events. An historian ought to be in the cabinet of princes, and at the head of their armies; yet, even with these advantages, the prejudices of religion, and partiality towards his own country, will be apt to taint the truth of his narrations. In short, so many great and noble qualities are requisite to adorn the mind of a complete historian, that very few fince the creation of the world have advanced near to the highest pitch of historic excellence. But in the latter ages of the world, we have never found that any one, who ventured into that part of history I just mentioned, ever gained a great reputation; owing to the difficulty of judging clearly on the actions of our cotemporaries. The reader must pardon this short digression. To return.

Hitherto the british nation had been engaged in an unsuccessful war against France. The advantages M 4 which which the enemy had gained, were not of very great confequence in themfelves; but as they brought a reputation on their arms; and yet more, as they funk and depreffed the fpirits of their adverfaries. The englifh pined with difcontent, on their not being victorious in a juft and neceffary war. The only confolation they received, was from the eclat of the king of Pruffia's fuccefs; and the hopes of a change in the englifh miniftry, and, confequently, of one in the measures of the nation. The difcontents of the people ran very high throughout the kingdom : they could not forget Minorca: one may perceive how imbittered their minds were, by reading the addreffes which were prefented to the king on that occasion, from most of the boroughs and corporations in England.

Bad fuccefs, in the beginning of a war, under fuch a government as fublifts in England, is the neceffary confequence of a war. France, from the nature of her government, conftantly keeps up a great force both by land and fea; fo that, no fooner has fhe refolved on a war with any of her neighbours, than her forces are ready to march againft her enemies. In England the cafe is quite different: let a war be ever fo neceffary, a king of England can take no fteps to profecute it, before its neceffity and confequences are debated in parliament; and, even when they are approved of, the forces to carry on fuch a war are all to be raifed, (a very few excepted) and difciplined; it is always fome time before fuch troops as thofe can be brought to a clear knowledge of their manual exercife; without which, every one knows, they can be of but little ufe; and when they have acquired a competent dexterity in that part of the art of war, they are not then, by any means, on an equality with veteran troops.

From these reasons it is very evident, that France must, almost in the nature of things, have a great radvantage advantage over England, in the beginning of every war: not only reafon, but the remembrance of paft events will teach us this piece of political knowledge. But it is neceffary for the clearer understanding of this work to take a view of the state of France at this period.

The reader must not here expect to find this potent kingdom confidered in the fame light, as it was during the reign of her late monarch Lewis XIV, who approached almost as near to universal monarchy, as the emperor Charles V did in Germany and Spain. It was a general concatination of events that rendered France fo extremely formidable.

That monarch fucceeded Lewis XIII in the throne, in 1643, at a time when France was neither in a very flourishing nor a very feeble state. Ann of Austria obtained the sole regency of the kingdom; and made cardinal Mazarine, her chief minister, master of France and of herself. He had obtained that power over her, which an artful man will acquire over a woman, born without strength sufficient to govern, yet, with constancy enough to persist in her choice *.

This minifter, who governed France with variety of fuccefs, for 18 years, was formerly a mere adventurer, without any great pretences to family, credit or fortune; by birth a gentleman of Rome: his first patron was cardinal Sachetti; then he became a captain of horfe; but being taken notice of by cardinal Antonio Barberrini, he laid afide the military, and affumed the ecclefiastical habit. He was agent for the french, at the peace of Cafal, and behaving with courage and dexterity, recommended himfelf to cardinal Richelieu, who took him entirely into his confidence, and procured him a hat from Rome. He had a fine perfon, an eafy and infinuating addrefs, was poffeffed of all genteel accomplifhments, had an air of courtefy, and kindnefs, fpoke fenfibly of affairs of importance, agreeably and pleafantly on all other topicks. In fhort, he was an able ftatefman, and a finifhed courtier; but as for religion, virtue, honour, probity or regard for the people, they were (to fpeak without envy or prejudice) things out of his way; he did not either pretend to them himfelf, nor was he fufpected of having any acquaintance with them by others.

On his death the administration of affairs fell into the hands of Tellier, Colbert, and de Lionne, who had addrefs enough, by flattering their mafter, to keep their posts for a confiderable time. Colbert was comptroller general of the finances; a man of great parts, and most extensive genius : the war which preceded the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, concluded in 1668, was carried fuccefsfully through the abilities and advice of this minister; who always kept the revenues. of France in most excellent order : by that treaty France gained feveral important towns in Flanders. But the greatness of Colbert's genius is best feen in the great encouragement he gave to trade and manufactures ; it was through his management, that France became a maritime power. It was really aftonifhing to behold the fea-ports, which before were deferted and in ruins, now furrounded by works which were at once both their ornament and their defence; covered alfo with ships and mariners, and containing already near fixty large men of war. New colonies under the protection of the french flag, were fent from all parts into America, the East-Indies, and the coasts These were the great effects of that able of Africa. minister's administration, more for the advantage and glory of France than all the founding conquefts of Lewis XIV.

But the affairs of that nation took a very fatal change, in the war that monarch went into to fupport his grandfon on the throne of Spain. His able minifters, who had formerly conducted his affairs with fo much glory, were now all dead, and in their room none were placed but youths of no experience: Condé, Luxemburg, and Turenne, no longer commanded the armies of France; military difcipline, the very foul of armies, was utterly neglected; the marine was ruined, and all trade was at a ftand. The peace of Utrecht faved the nation from entire deftruction.

During the regency of the duke of Orleans, France recovered herself confiderably; that prince's adminiftration was certainly the best calculated for the intereft of the kingdom, of any he could poffibly purfue; and his plan for foreign affairs was the best laid, and best conducted, that the french had ever feen. He found the kingdom burdened with an immenfe national debt, by fome calculated to be near three hundred millions sterling : every one knows the rife and progrefs of the famous Miffifippi fcheme, by which the nation annihilated fo many millions. As destructive as fuch a scheme might be to individuals, yet the nation in general gained confiderably by it; and from that period, we find France continually regaining her credit, commerce, and power. At the beginning of the war of 1741, fhe was again much too powerful for the repose of Europe; by sea indeed, that power was not so formidable as it was by land; fince it is very certain, at the beginning of it, the whole naval power of France did not confift of quite forty ships of war of all fizes, which, though it be very fhort of what it was at the opening of the prefent century, yet is much fuperior to any force the french had of that nature, before the reign of Lewis XIV. And the commerce of France, though it was much inferior to what it had been, was yet certainly very very confiderable; for France loft by that war, in its trade, two hundred millions of their money, which makes above nine millions three hundred thousand pounds of ours: by which we may perceive, that their trade was arrived at a furprising height; but then we also find that it was reduced by that war to nothing.

After the conclusion of the peace, the french miniftry continued to load the kingdom with exorbitant taxes, to pay those debts they had contracted during the war; but the miserable condition of the nation at that time, was fuch, that they could not afford fo large a part of their property, as was neceffary to discharge them; fo that France at the commencement of the late war was burdened with very near the fame debts, as she was at the conclusion of the preceding one.

With England the cafe was different. This nation indeed, was burthened with a very heavy national debt; but then fhe enjoyed a more extensive and flourifhing commerce than France, and her naval power infinitely exceeded that of her enemy. Yet these advantages we find were ballanced at the beginning of the war, by the advantages which the government of France has over a limited one in military proceedings. This was the cafe in the war of which I am speaking; hitherto, very indifferent fuccefs had crowned the attempts of the british nation; Europe, Afia, and America, were equally the unfuccefsful theatres of our military affairs.

This bad fuccefs, although it depended in part on the natural confequences of the war, yet the miniftry then at the helm of affairs in this kingdom, certainly did not fhew those abilities, and resolution, that were neceffary to carry on fo great an undertaking as a warwith France. In England a minister always makes a very bad figure at the eve of a war. It is the nature of our conflictution, to have an opposition to every minister's minister's measures, carried on in parliament: this ran extremely high at the beginning of this war; ever fince the loss of Minorca, which reflected fo much difgrace on the british nation, the kingdom in general wished ardently for a change, both of ministress and measures.

The effects of this general difcontent were foon perceived; for we find, that in the beginning of november, his majefty was pleafed to make the follow-ing alterations in the ministry; the duke of Devonfhire was made first lord commissioner of the treasury, in the room of the duke of Newcastle, who was created a duke of Great Britain by the title of the duke of Newcastle under Lyne, in the county of Stafford. The other commissioners were, the right hon. Henry Legge, Robert Nugent, esq. the lord viscount Dun-cannon, and the hon. James Grenville. The right hon. Henry Legge, was also appointed chancellor and under treasurer of the Exchequer. The right hon. the earl of Ilchefter, and James Creffert, efq. were made comptrollers of the accounts of his majefty's army. The new commissioners of the admiralty were Richard earl of Temple, the hon. Edward Bof-cawen, Temple Weft, and John Pitt, efqrs. George Hay, L. L. D. Thomas Orby Hunter, and Gilbert Elliot, esqrs. The right hon. George Grenville, was made treasurer of his majesty's navy. Earl Temple, lord Mansfield, John viscount Bateman (treasurer of his majefty's houfhold) and Richard Edgecombe, efq. (comptroller of his majeft's houfhold) were fworn of the privy council. Lidd lord Berkeley was made captain of his majefty. And of penfioners. The right hon. Wills Hill, earl & Hilfborough, in Ireland, was created a baron of Great Britain, by the title of lord Harwich. Sir George Lyttleton was created Baron Lyttleton. The 4th of december following, his majesty appointed the right hon. Wil-liam Pitt, to be one of his majesty's principal secretaries cretaries of ftate, in the room of the right hon. Henry Fox, who refigned. This principal, amongft the party who were now pufhed out of the ministry, finding the current run fo strong against him, thought it prudent to refign, with hopes that he might have an opportunity to regain his power, and establish himfelf more firmly in his lost feat.

Private adventurers by fea, met with more general fuccefs in their undertakings than the royal fquadrons: That of the antigallican privateer in particular; it was fitted out by the fociety of antigallicans; it was formerly the Flamborough man of war, then a merchant's veffel, and afterwards the antigallican priva-teer; fhe mounted 28 guns, and carried 208 men; was commanded by captain William Fofter. She failed from Deptford the 17th of feptember. About 100 leagues west of Lisbon, she met with the Maria Therefa, a french ship from the West-Indies, mounting 14 carriage guns, and carrying 30 men; after a brifk engagement for a quarter of an hour fhe ftruck, and was valued at upwards of 20,000 l. A. little further fouth, the antigallican took a fnow, of 180 tons, from Bourdeaux, laden with wine, bale goods, pitch, and diftilled waters, valued at near 15,000 l. A little north east of Madeira, she was chafed by two french men of war, but escaped by means of a calm.

They next cruifed off the coaft of Galicia in Spain; and on the 26th of december in the morning, difcovered a fail; they gave chace under fpanifh colours; at 12 got within gun-fhot, when fhe fired a gun, upon which the antigallican took down fpanifh and hung up englifh colours, on which the enemy gave them a broad-fide, and killed three men, but had no return till the englifh captain was clofe along-fide, where he engaged till three, when fhe ftruck. She proved to be the duke de Penthievre Eaft-India man, bound laft from Madagafcar, and commanded by captain captain Villeneuf, was upwards of 1000 tons burthen, mounting 50 guns; the french captain and 12 men were killed, the fecond captain fhot through the shoulder, and 27 more were wounded. Capt. Foster loft 12 men and 26 wounded. The captain proceeded. for Cadiz, where he met with very difagreeable treatment, for the spaniards in the french interest, together with the french confuls infifted that the duke de Penthievre was taken within gun-shot of the coaft of. Spain; the truth of this did not appear altogether fo clear; but if it was fo, the behaviour of the fpaniards in the affair was unprecedented, and contrary to the laws of nations : a rupture with Spain at that time, would have been of very bad confequence; fo the reftitution of the prize was agreed to by the english ministry.

Such was the iffue of an affair which made much noife, and occasioned very just observations on the partiality of the spaniards to our enemies the french; which fome were pleafed to attribute to the difhonour which the nation fustained in the loss of Minorca; and that certainly with fome reafon; for the fpaniards were the first nation who exposed their furprife at fo strange an affair as the conquest of Minorca : It appeared very strange in their eyes, that the most powerful maritime nation in the world, should fuffer fo ignominious a lofs. Even at this day, it is not clearly proved, whether the indiaman was a lawful prize or not, but thus far we may affirm with certain-ty, that the irregularity with which the fpaniards conducted, or rather obscured the transactions in this affair, was illegal, and fully proved how partially they acted towards the french.

But it is now time to give the reader fome account of the proceedings in parliament, for we must look into them to perceive the important fprings that move the great machine of the british power. That august assessed and the second december, when his majefty majefty came with the usual flate, and made a moff gracious speech to both houses; and received as dutiful and affectionate address.

His majefty mentioned his having fent the hanoverian troops home, and in the lords addrefs he was thanked for bringing them over; but it occafioned a warm debate in the houfe; however, as his majefty had fent for them at the requeft of his parliament, the thanks were at laft agreed to by the majority of the houfe. But in the addrefs of the commons, no fuch paragraph of thanks appeared.

In purfuance of what was mentioned concerning them, in his majefty's fpeech, we find that the hanoverians were fent home; and in that manner ended part of a meafure which reflected fo much diffionour on the nation; and will always be remembered in the annals of Britain with regret. But it was not yet thought feafonable to part with the heffians. They were ordered into winter quarters.

Indeed there was nothing in England at this time but wore a gloomy appearance. It is a very great prefumption, that the affairs of a nation does not go well, when there are many court martials and boards of enquiry; this was the cafe in the beginning of this war in England. His majesty by a warrant dated november the 22d, directed fir John Ligonier, general Hufke, and general Cholmondeley to enquire into the conduct of major general Stuart, and the colonels Cornwallis, and the earl of Effingham. The charge against them, was their not joining their respective commands in the island of Minorca. The board met december the 8th, and were alfo to enquire, whether they had ufed their utmost endeavour to throw themfelves into fort St. Philip's; and why, being only paffengers, they affifted at the fea council of war, which advifed Mr. Byng to return immediately to Gibraltar.

The three officiers made much the fame defence; they proved that it was not in their power to be at Minorca before Mr. Byng's fleet, and that they could not throw themfelves into that island; that as to their affifting at the council of war, they supposed themfelves under the command of the admiral; and affifted, as they thought they were bound to co-operate with the fea officers, to the utmost of their power, for the advancement of his majesty's service. General Cornwallis added verbally, " May I be permitted "to fay, that I have been now upwards of 26 " years in his majefty's fervice, and employed in " more fervice, and greater variety, perhaps, than " any officer of my years and ftanding in the army; " that it has been my good fortune, during the " course of my fervice, never to have had a repri-" mand, or even a rebuke, from any fuperior officer; " and, that I have had the honour to ferve under " the feveral general officers appointed for this en-" quiry; I flatter myfelf they will bear teftimony of " my zeal for, and forwardness in, the king's fervice " upon all occasions." On the whole, the board humbly submitted it to his majesty, as their unanimous opinion, that the conduct of the faid major general and colonels was clear from any fufpicion of disobedience of orders, or neglect of duty.

In France, the winter was fpent in the ufual preparations for war; but every thing was fuddenly ftopped on the 6th of january, by one of the moft defperate attempts recorded in hiftory. As the king was going from Trianon to Verfailles, to vifit madam de Victoire; about fix in the evening, as his majefty was just ftepping into his coach, to return to Trianon, a man, who had concealed himfelf between the hind wheels, rufhed forward, with his hat on, made his way to the king's perfon through the guards (one of whom he fhoved againft the dauphin) and ftruck his majefty on the right fide, of which however, he only complained, by faying, " That man " has given me a violent blow, he must be either " mad or drunk." But having perceived that his hand which he clapped to his fide, was bloody, he faid, " I am wounded; feize that fellow but don't " kill him. His majefty was immediately carried to his apartment. The wound, (which from the first was not thought dangerous) was given with a fharp pointed knife, which glanced upwards between the fourth and fifth rib, but was not of any confiderable depth; and at the first dreffing, it was even judged that the cure would be fpeedy. That night the king flept an hour and a quarter, and every day recovered more and more. The day after the king received the wound, the dauphin was charged with the adminiftration of the kingdom, and prefided in the council of ftate during the king's illnefs. The next day, all the prefidents and counfellors of the parliament, affembled, and deliberated on the event; and in the evening they carried to Verfailles the deliberation.

The wretch, Robert Francis Damien (for that was his name) was born in 1714, at Arras; in 1738 he married, and had a daughter by that marriage. His brother was immediately taken into cuftody. His father was ftill living, in the 85th year of his age. The process against him was begun at Versailles, and the conclusion of it was, that his father, wife and daughter, should quit the kingdom for ever; but as for himfelf,—humanity won't permit me to recite the barbarous shocking cruehties which were made use of at his execution, to torture a poor wretch, who plainly appeared, by his trial, to be mad.

The preparations which were making by France, convinced the british ministry, that the war England was engaged in, would prove a continental one. The french were drawing their troops together from all parts, into two camps on the frontiers of Flanders, which feemed, by their situation, to contain armies deftined ftined to act in Germany. Indeed it was believed, in all the courts of Europe, that France would, early in the fpring, march an army into the electorate of Hanover, to involve an innocent people into the horrors of a bloody war, becaufe their fovereign was king of England. In fact, this defign of the french was fo much regarded in England as to occafion the following meffage being fent by his majefty, by Mr. fecretary Pitt, to the houfe of commons, the 17th of february, 1757, viz.

" George R.

It is always with reluctance that his majefty afks any extraordinary fupplies of his people; but as the united councils and formidable preparations of France, and her allies, threaten, with the moft alarming confequences, Europe in general; and as thefe moft unjust and vindictive defigns are particularly and immediately bent against his majefty's electoral dominions, and those of his good ally the king of Prufia; his majefty confides in the experienced zeal and affection of his faithful commons, that they will chearfully affift him, in forming and maintaining an army of observation, for the just and neceffary defence and prefervation thereof; and enable his majefty to fulfil his engagements with the king of Prufia, for the fecurity of the empire, against the irruption of foreign armies, and for the fupport of the common cause.

G. R."

This meffage was referred to the committee of fupply; and on the 21ft it was refolved to grant his majefty 200,000 l. for the purpofes therein mentioned in it. Let us for a moment enquire into the utility of this measure; and we shall find, for all what fome pretended politicians are pleased to tell us to the contrary, that it was a necessfary one; we might be very N 2 fure, fure, when first the british ministry feized the fhips of France, that that nation would revenge itself by attacking Hanover, and it certainly was confonant with laws, human and divine, to refolve to defend it, confidering the unhappy hanoverians were forced into a deftructive war, on our account, without having more to do with the troubles then in Europe than the inhabitants of Lapland; and, as the measure was just and neceffary, it was also neceffary to form an army of observation, for that purpose. His royal highness the duke of Cumberland was appointed by his majesty for that command; he embarked at Harwich the 9th of april, in his way to Hanover, where he arrived fafe : and where I shall leave him till I come to give an account of the operations of the troops under his command.

The naval affairs of England at this period, were not of great eclat. The french were extremely buly in fitting out two great fleets at Breft, and port l'Orient; the english ministry had taken care to have a fuperior one lying off Breft harbour, under the command of fir Edward Hawke, who, in that station, fucceeded Mr. Bofcawen, and had difpatched admiral Weft with 11 fail of the line on a cruife to the weftward : But all these precautions did not hinder a french fquadron getting out of Breft, and the other likewife from port l'Orient. The one convoyed troops for the weft, and the other fet fail for the East-Indies. The former was under the command of M. de Beaufremont, and confifted of fixteen fail of the line, and five frigates, carrying between 5 and 6000 men on board. Another french fquadron, under the command of M. de Reveft, a french admiral, alfo failed from Toulon for America ; admiral Saunders was then at Gibraltar, with an english one, and was informed that the french appeared off Malaga, upon which he went, with five fhips, in pursuit of them ; the 5th of april he faw the french, and, being to leeward, formed a line, line, as did the enemy, and fome of the fhips began to engage at a diffance; but before the reft got up, they loft fight of the french, and could meet with them no more: what was peculiarly unfortunate was, Mr. Saunders's not being able to prevent Reveft paff-ing the Streights, which he did, in his way to America. The english West-India fleet, under admiral Town-schend, at this time, confisted of four ships of the line and three frigates : it was very furprising that the british ministry had not sent a greater force to that flation, espcially as there were so many french squa-drons ready to fail.

In the East-Indies a much brighter fuccess at-tended the british arms. Mr. Watson, the english admiral, who commanded in the East-Indies, failed from Madrafs, on the 16th of october, with three fail of the line and fome frigates, for Bengal, and after a tedious voyage arrived, december the 5th, at the port of Balafore, in the kingdom of Bengal, where ftrengthening his force with what recruits he could draw together, he entered the Ganges, and after a fhort refiftence, on the 30th of january, made himfelf mafter of Bufbudgia, having landed colonel Clive to attack it by land: the conqueft of this fort opened a paffage to Calcutta, the late principal fettlement of the company in Bengal, and the fcene of the deplorable fufferings of fo many of our unfortunate countrymen. The troops and failors, at the very fight of the place, were animated with re-venge, and attacked it with fo much bravery, that they became maîters of it the very day it was ap-proached, and found in it four mortars, 91 guns of different fizes, and a confiderable quantity of all kinds of ammunition. In a few days afterwards, they burnt and deftroyed the city of Hughley, together with the granaries and ftore-houfes of falt, fituated on the banks of each fide the river, which was of great prejudice to the nabob's army. The

The nabob, in the mean time, finding how victorious the englifh arms were, when oppofed only by garrifons of indians, marched down, on the 2d of february, 1757, with his whole army, confiiting of 10,000 horfe and 12,000 foot, with a defign to drive the englifh from their late conquefts. Col. Clive immediately demanded of the admiral a detachment of failors, to come to the affiftance of the land forces; accordingly the admiral detached capt. Warwick with a party. On receiving this reinforcemet, the colonel determined to attack the nabob in his camp, although he was fo much fuperior to him in numbers. On the 5th, he put this bold defign in execution; the victory was complete, the nabob being obliged to quit the field of battle, fince none of his troops could ftand against the defperate bravery of their enemies.

The confequence of this battle was, that the nabob made propofals of peace to col. Clive, which were agreed to. By this treaty the englifh Eaft-India company were re-eftablifhed in the poffeffion of all its fettlements and privileges, an immunity from all taxes was granted, and a reflictution promifed of all that the company had fuffered at the taking of Calcutta.

The war with the indians being thus for a while concluded, the admiral thought he could not better employ his forces than by attacking the fettlement of the french at Chandernagore, fituated feveral miles higher up the river than Calcutta, being a place of confiderable firength and importance, and one of the greateft which the french had in that part of the Eaft-Indies. Col. Clive, for this expedition, put himfelf at the head of 700 europeans, and 1700 blacks, and the admirals Watfon and Pocock commanded the ficet, which was to fecond the operations of the land forces. To prevent an attack from fhipping, the french funk feveral large vefiels in the river; but this intended precaution was of no fervice, for Mr. Watfon Watfon having diligently founded the river, found a fafe paffage, without weighing up any of the fhips; fo that on the 24th he failed up, and fired fo brifkly on the place, the fame being done from col. Clive's batteries on the fhore, that it capitulated in three hours. They had in the fort 1200 men, 500 of which were europeans, and 700 blacks; 183 pieces of cannon, from 24 pounders and downwards; three fmall mortars, and a confiderable quantity of ammunition.

This great fuccefs paved the way for more confider-able operations. The english had found that the nabob, although he had figned a peace with them, was not to be trufted; and would break it on the first good opportunity. Mr. Watfon and col Clive having reestablished the East-India company in their possessions, and things being quiet, confulted the most confiderable of their body which were the wifeft measures to be put in execution against the nabob, so as to ensure themselves in fafety. That prince had shewn his bad intentions, by not executing the late treaty, on frivolous pretences. It was refolved, that the most ex-pedient manner of bringing him to reason, was by force of arms; accordingly they prepared to attack him, a fcheme full of the most dangerous difficulties; but these were in great part removed, by a most fortunate incident, which they had not the least reafon to expect, when they took the refolution to attack him.

The nabob, as I have more fully faid before, was one of the most horrid tyrants that ever afflicted any nation; his fubjects, as well as his enemies, had ex-perienced the violence and perfidy of his temper; they were all discontented with his government, particularly the most confiderable officers in his army, who had entered into a confpiracy against him, at the head of which was Jaffier Ali Cawn, a man of great power and interest. No fooner were their defigns ripe for. execution, than they communicated them to the englifh lifh government in Calcutta, defiring their affift-ance. Nothing could better agree with their de-figns; they were too weak to encounter alone, al-though the fpirit of their leaders had overlooked the numbers of their enemies; but being aided by this confpiracy, they did not doubt of punishing the nabob, in fuch a manner as his perfidy deferved. They did not hesitate a moment, but entered into a treaty. with Jaffier Ali Cawn, and the reft of the confpirators; and in consequence of that action, the english troops marched under colonel Clive. That none of the landmen might be kept at home, the admiral garrifoned Chandernagore with his failors, and moreover detached 50 of them to join the army, to ferve as gunners. All these steps being taken, in order to enfure fuccefs in their attempt, they advanced up. the river, with defign to bring the nabob's army to a battle; they effected this in a few days, and the victory was decided in favour of the english, being fought on the the 22d of june. A confiderable part of the nabob's army, under the command of Jaffier, re-mained inactive during the engagement; and the nabob finding himfelf deferted by his own officers, fled with the few that remained faithful to him, leaving the field of battle to his enemies. The battle was no fooner over, than Jaffier Ali Cawn openly declared himfelf, and entered Muxadavat, the capital of the kingdom, with an army of his friends, and victorious allies. By the affiftance of col. Clive, he placed himfelf in the ancient feat of the nabob's, and received the homage of all ranks of people, as fuba of Bengal, Bahar and Orixa : he foon after put to death the deposed nabob.

By the alliance which colonel Clive concluded with Jaffier, and by the reduction of Chandernagore, the french were entirely driven out of Bengal, and all its dependencies, this being one of the articles of the treaty. By the reft a perpetual alliance, ance, offenfive and defenfive, was made between the parties, the territories of the company were enlarged, and upwards of 2,000,000 fterling was ftipulated to be paid, as an indemnification to the Eaft-India company, and the fufferers in the taking of Calcutta. The new nabob, through gratitude to those who had placed him in his throne, gave, besides the above large fums, about 600,000 l. as a gratuity to the fea fquadron and troops.

In this wonderful manner was the englifh fuccefsful in the Eaft-Indies. In thirteen days they effected fo great a revolution, with fuch an inconfiderable number of troops, giving away a kingdom near as big as France, a kingdom more fertile, more populous, and infinitely more rich. All this was the refult of that prudence, conduct, and courage, with which the admiral and colonel, feconded by the intrepidity of their men, formed and executed fuch noble and daring projects. Indeed, the joy of the nation, on hearing thefe fignal fucceffes, was much damped by the death of admiral Watfon, who loft his life by the unwholefomenefs of the climate, having gained a great and lafting reputation.

In England, the face of affairs had not fuch a bright afpect. The nation, at this time, was entirely held in fufpence, about the fate of Mr. Byng. By his majefty's command, fignified to the commiffioners of the admiralty, that unfortunate admiral was brought before a court martial, which met on the 28th of december, 1756, on board the St. George fhip in Portfmouth harbour, and confifted of the following members :

Thomas Smith, efq. vice-admiral of the red, Francis Holbourne, efq. rear-admiral of the red, Harry Norris, efq. rear-admiral of the white, Thomas Broderick, efq. rear-admiral of the blue.

Captain

Captain Charles Holmes, Captain William Boys, Captain John Simcoe, Captain John Bentley, Captain Peter Denis, Captain Francis Geary, Captain John Moore, Captain James Douglafs, Hon. Auguftus Keppel.

The admiral's inftructions, letters, and other neceffary papers being read to the court, they proceeded to examine their witneffes. Thefe examinations would be tedious to the reader ; and befides, every paragraph fo abounds with naval terms, underftood only by fea officers, that not one man in twenty would be able to underftand a fyllable of it; for which reafon, I fhall only give the fubftance of the refolutions of the court martial, and make fuch remarks upon them, in particular, and on the fentence in general, as will enable the reader to form fome judgment on an affair, concerning which, opinions are at this day divided.

The 26th of january it was found, that the court had come on the three preceding days to the following refolutions, viz.

1. It does not appear the admiral made any unneceffary delay in his way from St. Hellens to Minorca.

2. It appears, that on the fleet's getting fight of Minorca, on the 19th of may, the admiral detached capt. Harvey with three frigates, to endeavour to land a letter for general Blakeney; and to reconnitre the enemies batteries.

3. It appears, that those frigates were got near to Mahon, endeavouring to execute the orders, till they were called off by fignal from the admiral.

4. It.

4. It appears that the fleet flood towards the enemy the remaining part of the day.

5. The court are of opinion, that the admiral proceeded properly, upon difcovery of the french fleet, to ftand towards them.

6. It appears, that major general Stuart, lord Effingham, and col. Cornwallis, and 200 men, with their officers, belonging to the garrifon, were on board the fquadron.

7. The court are of opinion, that as fo great a number of officers were on board the fleet, the admiral ought to have put them on board one of the abovementioned frigates, to have landed them, if found practicable; and if not landed before he faw the french fleet, to have left the frigates to have effected it notwithstanding.

8. It appears, that from the morning of the 19th, when the admiral first faw the french fleet, till the 20th at noon, the admiral took proper measures to gain and keep the wind of the enemy, and to form and close the line of battle.

13. It appears, that the admiral made the fignal for battle about 20 minutes after two o'clock.

14. It appears, at the time the fignal was made for battle, our van was confiderably nearer to their van, than our rear was to their rear.

15. It appears, that upon fignal being made for battle, the fhips of our van division bore down properly, for the fhips opposed to them, in the enemy's line, and engaged them, till the five headmost fhips of the enemy went away out of gun-fliot.

16. It appears, that the Intrepid having engaged 10 minutes, or a quarter of an hour, loft her foretopmaft.

19. It is the opinion of the court, that the admiral, in the Ramillies, after the fignal was made for battle, feparated the rear from the van division, and retarded the the rear division of the british fleet from closing with, and engaging the enemy, by his shortening fail.

20. It is the opinion of the court, that inftead of fhortening fail, the admiral ought to have made the Trident and the Princefs Louifa fignals to make more fail; and he ought alfo to have fet fo much fail himfelf, as would have enabled the Culloden to have kept her flation, in order to have got down with as much expedition as possible to the enemy, and thereby have properly supported the van division.

23. It appears, that when the firing had been continued a little while in the Ramillies, an alarm was given, of a fhip being clofe under her lee-bow, which proved to be the Trident; upon which the admiral fhortened fail, and ordered his men to ceafe firing till they fhould fee french colours.

24. It appears, that the Princels Louisa was also feen about the fame time, upon the weather-bow of the Ramillies.

25. The court are of opinion, that while the Ramillies was firing, in going down, the Trident, and fhips immediately a-head of the Ramillies, proved an impediment to the Ramillies continuing to go down.

26. The court are of opinion, that the admiral acted wrong, in directing the fire of the Ramillies to be continued, before he had placed her at a proper diftance from the enemy; as he thereby not only threw away fhot ufelefsly, but occafioned a fmoke, which prevented his feeing the motions of the enemy, and the pofition of the fhips immediately a-head of the Ramillies.

32. The court are of opinion, that after the fhips, which had received damage in the action, were as much refitted, as circumftances would permit, the admiral ought to have returned with the fquadron off St. Philip's, and have endeavoured to have opened a communication with that caftle; and to have ufed every every means in his power, for its relief, before he returned to Gibraltar.

33. The court are of opinion, that admiral Byng did not do his utmost to relieve St. Philip's castle, in the island of Minorca, then besieged by the forces of the french king.

34. The court are of opinion, that admiral Byng, during the engagement, did not do his utmost to take, feize, and destroy the ships of the french king, which it was his duty to have engaged; and to affiss fuch of his majesty's ships as were engaged in fight with the french ships, which it was his duty to have affissed.

35. It appears, by the evidence of lord Robert Bertie, lieutenant colonel Smith, captain Gardiner, and by other officers of the fhip, who were near the perfon of the admiral, that they did not perceive any backwardnefs in the admiral, during the action, or any marks of fear or confusion, either from his countenance or behaviour; but, that he feemed to give his orders cooly and diffinctly; and did not feem wanting in perfonal courage.

36. Refolved, that the admiral appears to fall under the following part of the 12th article of war, to wit, " or fhall not do his utmost to take or destroy every ship, which it shall be his duty to engage; and to assist and relieve all and every of his majesty's ships, which it shall be his duty to assist and relieve."

37. Refolved, as that article pofitively prefcribes death, without any alternative left to the difcretion of the court, under any variation of circumftances, that he be adjudged to be flot to death, at fuch time, and on board fuch fhip, as the lords commiffioners of the admiralty fhall direct. But as it appears by the evidence of lord Robert Bertie, lieutenant colonel Smith, captain Gardiner, and other officers of the fhip, who were near the perfon of the admiral, that they did not perceive any backwardnefs in him during the action, or any marks of fear or confusion, either from his countenance or behaviour, but that he feemed to give his orders cooly and diftinctly, and did not feem wanting in perfonal courage, and from other circumftances; the court do not believe, that his mifconduct arole either from cowardice or difaffection; and do therefore unanimoufly think it their duty moft earneftly to recommend him as a proper object of mercy.

At the fame time that these resolutions were tranfmitted to the lords of the admiralty, the members of the court drew up a representation to that board, which, as it is a very remarkable paper, 1 shall present the reader with it at full length.

"We the underwritten, the prefident and members of the court martial, affembled for the trial of admiral Byng, believe it unneceffary to inform your lordfhips, that in the whole course of this long trial, we have done our utmost endeavours to come at truths, and do the strictest justice to our country and the prisoner; but we cannot help laying the distress of our minds before your lordships, on this occasion, in finding ourfelves under a neceffity of condemning a man to death, from a great feverity of the 12th article of war, part of which he falls under, and which admits of no mitigation, even if the crime should be committed by an error in judgment only; and therefore, for our confciences fakes, as well as in justice to the prifoner, we pray your lordfhips, in the most earnest manner, to recommend him to his majesty's clemency. We are, &c. Dated jan. 27, 1757.

Such were the refolutions of this court martial; and fuch their reprefentation to the admiralty. The reader, no doubt, in his perufal of them, has been much furprifed to find the admiral's judges condemn him to death, for his falling under part of the 12th article of war, and most earnessly recommending him to his majefty, (191) majefty, as a proper object for mercy; and their reafon for this fentence is, the feverity of that article of war. But here I must warn the reader, not to expect certainty or demonstration in what I shall advance on this subject; I shall only make a few remarks, such as naturally arise from a due consideration of the whole affair.

The 12th article of war runs,—" Every perfon in the fleet, who, through cowardice, negligence, or difaffection, fhall, in time of action, &c. &c.—and being convicted thereof, by the fentence of a court martial, fhall fuffer death." On this, Mr. Byng, (in his defence, which is penned with great art and judgment) jufty obferves, that, in order to bring any perfon within the peril of this article, he muft be convicted of cowardice, negligence, or difaffection; for though he fhould fail to engage or affift, &c. unlefs this failure apparently proceeds from one of these causes, he is not guilty.—Negligence cannot be taken in so large a fense, as to mean every fort of neglect or omiffion; but so mean every fort of neglect or omiffion the function of the affection.

Let me in the next place obferve, that the court martial, in their 37th refolution, acquits him from cowardice or difaffection, in thefe words, " The court do not believe, that his mifconduct arofe either from cowardice or difaffection." Confequently they could then condemn him only for his negligence; that word equally means the negligence occafioned by cowardice or difaffection, and that occafioned by error in judgment; the former of thefe, the court acquits him of; and, as to the latter, they formed a very juft opinion of it, when they reprefented to the admiralty the great feverity of the 12th article of war, which admits of no mitigation, even if the crime fhould be committed by any error in judgment only.

In the 7th refolution of the court martial, they are of opinion, that the admiral ought to have put the officers on board one of the frigates he fent a-head to be landed. But it ought here to be remembered. that when the fleet arrived off Minorca, feveral of the fhips were difperfed; and the officers belonging to the garrifon were diftributed throughout the different fhips of the fleet; and could not have been put on board one of the frigates at that time, without fome hours delay; when, at the fame time, the fleet was advancing with a fresh gale of wind, and fair for the harbour. Would it not have been very injudicious in the admiral, when the enemy's fleet appeared fteering towards ours, and was known to be fuperior to it, to weaken his own force *; especially as his fleet was badly manned, and fickly; for the men belonging to the frigates were neceffary, and were actually diftributed to reinforce the line of battle fhips : the cnemy were at that time mafters of the harbour, and it might have been regarded as an imprudent ftep to hazard fo many officers in a fingle frigate, under that circumstance.

In the 37th refolution of this court martial, they are of opinion, that the admiral ought to have returned, after the action off St. Philip's, and have endeavoured to open a communication with the caftle, before he returned to Gibraltar. I muft, on this refolution, remark, that after the action, the enemy's fleet was feen feveral times lying between the englifh fleet and the harbour, fo that it was impoffible to attempt it, without coming to a fecond battle. The french fleet had not, to appearance, fuffered any di-

* Mr. Weft, in his evidence, fays, that the garrifon of St. Philip's was to look on the englifh fleet at that time as its protection, as far as it might be fuppofed able to protect it; therefore, the weakening the force of the fleet would have been highly inexcufable, under the circumftance of feeing the enemy's fleet, as well as by exposing the englifh fleet to that of the enemy, who was at that time, in my opinion, fuperior to it.

minution in its force; whereas four of our fhips were rendered incapable of action, the Intrepid was obliged to be towed with jury mafts to Gibraltar, and when the Portland arrived there, it could not be hoved down; and was reported unfit for fervice: further, the admiral called, on the 23th of may, a general council of war, of all the fea and land officers, who were unanimoufly of opinion, that it was for his majefty's fervice to proceed directly to Gibraltar. And what is very remarkable, this council of war was taken no notice of in the refolutions of court martial *.

• I shall here beg leave to give a few short extracts from the trial.

Admiral West was asked,

Queft. Do you apprehend, if it had been practicable, and the land forces had been thrown in to reinforce the garrifon, that the fhips would have been fit for action, to engage the enemy's fleet ?

Anfw. No, I think not.

Queft. Do you apprehend that the throwing in fuch an inconfiderable reinforcement, as one hundred officers and recruits, had there been a probability of effecting it, would have been a fufficient reafon for loofing time, and delaying to attack the enemy's fleet, when in fight i

Anfw. I have faid of how little ufe it appears to me, thefe officers and foldiers would have been to the garrifon; and though, even they might have been of more ufe than I imagine, the men were at that time very neceflary to the fervice of the fleet, and therefore not to be parted with, independent even of the delay which it might have occafioned.

Queft. Do you apprehend it would have been proper for the admiral to have left any of the frigates, and by that means to have leffened his force, and deprived the fleet of the use of any of the fhips or men, when upon the brink of coming to an action ?

Anfw. As fome fhips of the fleet, from ficknefs, or being flort of complement, wanted men to fupply the deficiency, I do apprehend, that the leaving any frigates behind, would have been improper, as their men would have been taken away from fupplying fuch deficiency in part, for which they were neceffary.

Captain Gardiner was afked,

Queft. Had you any men killed in the action !

Anfw. No; nor do I look upon her to have been engaged as the admiral could have wifhed, and expressed his inclination to do, having feveral times faid in our going down, while the shot were

As foon as the fentence was known, the lords of the admiralty received a petition from the lord vifc. Torrington, nephew to the admiral, importing, that himfelf, and the reft of his afflicted family, being advifed that many material things might be offered to their lordfhips, to fhew, that the fentence of the court martial ought not to be executed; prayed the permiffion to lay before them by council, to be appointed on behalf of the admiral, fuch reafons as might be offered for not executing the fentence. In anfwer to which petition, the lords of the admiralty appointed the next day to receive the reafons in writing, mentioned in the petition.

It being towards the close of the term, the council applied to could not, by reafon of their indifpenfible attendance on the feveral courts of law and equity, be prepared fo foon to advife and affift his lordfhip and family; accordingly they prefented a fecond petition, praying an indulgence of a few days longer. But on the 9th of february, the lords of the admiflying over us, and hitting us, that he did not intend to throw his fhot away, till he came near the enemy.

Lord Robert Bertie was afked,

Queft. Was you near to the admiral's perfon before, and during the time of the action, and did you obferve his behaviour?

Anfw. I was near him the whole day of the action in general.

Queft. Did you perceive any backwardnefs in the admiral during the action, or any marks of fear or confusion, either from his countenance or behaviour?

Aníw. No; he feemed to give his orders cooly and diffinely, and I do not apprehend, that he was in the leaft wanting in perfonal courage.

Queft. Did the admiral appear follicitous to engage the enemy, and to affift his majefty's fhips, that were engaged with the enemy? Anfw, Yes.

Queft. Did your lordship on, or after the day of action, hear any murmuring or discontent among the officers or men, upon any supposition, that the admiral had not done his duty?

Anfw. I never heard any one of the Ramillies fpeak the leaft difrefpectfully of the admiral, or ever hint that the admiral had not done his duty. ralty prefented a memorial to his majefty, of which the following is an extract :

" The proceedings of the court martial on admiral Byng, have been reported to us, and we have taken them into our most ferious and deliberate confideration, and doubts having arifen, with regard to the legality of the fentence, particularly, whether the crime of negligence, which is not expressed in any part of the proceedings, can, in this cafe, be fupplied by implication, we find ourfelves obliged most humbly to befeech your majefty, that the opinion of the judges may be taken, whether the faid fentence is legal."

In confequence of this memorial, his majefty laid the fentence before the judges; who gave their opinion, that it was a legal fentence; which opinion being transmitted to the commissioners of the admiralty, they figned a warrant the 16th of february, directed to vice-admiral Boscawen, at Portsmouth, directing him to have the admiral shot, on board what ship he thought proper, on the 28th, by a platoon of marines.

But he was respited for some time; for on the 26th his majefty fent a meffage to the houfe of commons, from which I have made the following extract :

" Being informed, that a member of the house of commons, who was a member of the court martial, has, in his place, applied to the houfe, in behalf of himfelf, and feveral other members of the faid court, praying the aid of parliament, to be releafed from the oath of fecrecy imposed on courts martial, in order to disclose the grounds, whereon sentence of death paffed on the faid admiral; the refult of which difcovery may fhew the fentence to be improper; his majefty has thought fit to respite the execution of the fame, in order that there may be an opportunity of knowing, by the feparate examination of the members

bers of the faid court, upon oath, what grounds there is for the above fuggestion."

In confequence of this meffage, a motion was made for bringing in a bill, to releafe from the obligation of the oath of fecrecy, the members of the court martial, purfuant to the exception contained in the faid oath; and accordingly the bill was prepared, prefented, read, amended, and ordered to be engroffed all in one day. The 28th, it was read the third time and paffed, and carried up to the lords for their concurrence; but that houfe examined the members of the court martial on oath: the principal queftions afked them were,

1. Whether you know any matter that paffed, previous to the fentence pronounced upon admiral Byng, which may fhew that fentence to have been unjuft?

Unanimoufly anfwered in the negative.

2. Whether you know any matter that paffed, previous to the fentence, which may flew that fentence to have been given through any undue practice or motive?

Unanimoufly anfwered in the negative.

3. Whether you are defirous, that the bill now under the confideration of the houfe, for difpenfing with the oath of fecrecy, fhould pais into a law?

This and the next queftion were answered in the negative, by admirals Smith, Holbourn, and Broderick; captains Holmes, Geary, Boys, Simcoe, Douglafs, Bentley, and Denis. But admiral Norris, and the captains Moore, and Keppel, answered this queftion in the affirmative.

4. Whether you are of opinion, that you have any particulars to reveal, relative to the cafe of, and the fentence paffed upon, admiral Byng, which you judge neceffary for his majefty's information, and which you think likely to incline his majefty to mercy ?

Admiral Norris's answer to this question was, at the time I faid I was defirous the act should take place, I unI underftood that we fhould have an opportunity of delivering our particular reasons, for figning the fentence, and letter of recommendation. Capt. Moore's was, I do not think myfelf at liberty, while I am un-der this oath to anfwer that queftion. Capt. Keppel's was, I think that I cannot answer that question without particularifing the reafons for my vote and opinion.

The house as foon as this examination was finished, unanimoufly rejected the bill: and the fentence was executed on the admiral the 14th.

On this unfortunate affair, concerning which, opinions are fo much divided, I shall only observe, that many quote paffages in the trial of the admiral which fhew, that admiral Weft, and feveral of the captains in the van, knew no reafon why, Mr. Byng in the rear, should not come to a closer engagement; but this proves only that the admiral was faulty; but does it from thence appear, that this fault proceeded from cowardice or difaffection, might it not as well be attributed to an error in judgment. I have made this remark only in answer to a set of absurd people, who will produce a few anfwers in the trial to ftrengthen their argument; but as to regarding the refolutions of the court martial, they will pretend that no confidence is to be placed in them.

It fhould alfo be remembered, that Mr. Byng's fleet was fent out to protect or relieve Minorca : Now let it be afked, did those who sent him apprehend, that Minorca could be invaded before his arrival, and the defcent covered by a fuperior fquadron, when they fent him out with an inferior one-If they did, their conduct is unjuftifiable-If they did not, their ignorance is inexcufable.

It is very plain, from the conduct of the british ministry, that they never expected Mr. Byng could meet with the french fquadron; his inftructions the least intended fighting of any fervice. But indeed he was politively assured, before his departure from England, land, by the higheft naval authority, that the enemy could not fit out more than fix or feven fhips of the line at the most. We need only read the admiral's instructions to be convinced, that this was the real opinion of the admiralty; for he is ordered-If on his arrival at Gibraltar, he should hear that a french fquadron had paffed the Streights, to difpatch admiral West with a superior squadron after them to north America, and repair with the remainder himfelf to Minorca. By this it is very evident, that the miniftry in England did not know the french force; or elfe, how was Byng to difpatch a fuperior fleet after them, when the whole fleet he commanded was inferior to them. What epithet shall we bestow on an administration, no better informed of the enemy's motions than this conduct evinces ?

But if we confider the whole affair with that attention it deferves, shall we not evidently perceive, that the admiral fell a facrifice to cover the guilt of others, who were more powerful than himfelf. Let me afk against whom the fury of the populace would have directed itself, if contrary winds had kept Mr. Byng a week or a fortnight longer at Spithead, or at Gibraltar; and if, at the fame time, the french had had a skilful general at their head (for then Blakeney, instead of holding out eight or ten weeks, would not have been able to defend himfelf three) under those circumstances, it would have been impoffible for Mr. Byng, even to have endeavoured any thing; for it would have been taken before he got there. Had this been the cafe, I fay, who would have been the objects of the public rage? Mr. Byng, or those who sent him ? It was necessary to throw dust in the eyes of the people; or elfe, why was the Gazette (a paper supposed to be published by authority) proflituted to fpread a falfe lift of the ftrength of both fleets among the people, not only by undervaluing the enemy's force, of which it is poffible the writer might might be ignorant, but by overating Mr. Byng's, in which it is impoffible he fhould be innocent. Why was the admiral's letter mangled and curtailed in the manner it appeared in that paper ?

To fay more on this fubject will, I fear, be tedious to the reader. But thus much every honeft man will allow, that it was a fatal feverity to execute an admiral of a noble family, whofe anceftors had rendered fuch fervices to the crown, under fuch an infamous charge, when the very court martial that condemned him, declared him innocent, either of cowardice or difaffection; and for the fake of their own confcience recommended him in the most earnest manner as a fit object for his majefty's clemency.

NOTHING can be of fuch great confequence to the welfare of any nation, as to have one fettled plan of action (especially in time of war) to direct the steps of those who sit at the helm of affairs. Let great genius's form fine plans of operations; yet if they are not in power long enough to direct their execution, all their fchemes will most probably prove abortive. The state of Great-Britain at this conjuncture, was really deplorable; the ministry which had fo lately been eftablifhed, and which the greateft part of the nation wifhed to fee firmly feated in power, could no longer hold their feats. On the 5th of april, Mr. Pitt, by his majefty's command, refigned the office of fecretary of flate, and Mr. Legge was moved from being chancellor and under-treasurer of the Exchequer; a new commission for the admiralty appeared, with the earl of Winchelsea at their head. The party of the duke of Newcastle, and Mr. Fox, who had been fo lately obliged to quit their places, now refumed them. This faction, which was now uppermost, differed very much in their plan of action, from that of the late ministry; their chief characteristic was the great fear they were constantly in, of the overgrown power of France; they thought it eligible to bridle this at any rate, but principally by maintaining the ballance of power, which they proposed to effect, by raising up enemies to France, on the continent, with british subsidies, and even by fending over british troops to join the belligerent powers in their alliance. The late ministry's scheme when they were in power was different; they were equally of opinion, that the power of France was to be curbed, but thought the means of doing this, was more natural by our naval power; a conduct which the infular fituation of their country dictated to them. It is furprifing to find how great a degree of popularity this party poffeffed in the nation; no fooner were they out of power, than they had the freedoms of almost all the corporations in the kingdom prefented to them, in gold boxes, which shewed how much the nation regretted their difgrace at court.

The naval affairs of the two nations were at this period, of but little confequence; the latter end of march and beginning of april, feveral fquadrons were equipping at Portfmouth and Plymouth; one under admiral Weft, defigned for Ireland; in its way to America, confifting of 11 fail of the line, one frigate, a bomb, and a convoy of 50 transports, failed from St. Hellen's the 16th of april; we had a fmall fquadron at this time in the Downs, and another to the weftward, cruifing; and admirals Weft and Broderick had been cruifing fome time in the bay; but with little fucces. The french were hard at work in their ports, but fent no fquadron to fea.

In north America our affairs had for fome time wore the fame difinal appearance as they had done from the beginning of the war; but the earl of Loudon, having in the latter end of the year 1756, laid before the miniftry a plan for carrying on the war in that country, and which being approved of, his lordfhip was named by his majefty to command there in chief; better fuccefs was expected for the future, efpecially especially as a large body of troops was sent over to reinforce the army there. The plan his lordship was defirous to have executed, was the conquest of Cape Breton, and after that to proceed towards bringing all Canada under fubjection, by the conqueft of Quebec. To facilitate the undertaking this fcheme, the transports with troops from England, arrived at New York, in january 1757. Lord Loudon finding the men much fatigued with the hardfhips of a long voyage billetted them, by reafon of their number, indifcriminately on public and private houses ; this occasioned a great heat between the magistrates and his lordfhip, who afked them, if they thought that men who had fuffered a long winter's voyage, to come to their defence, were to perish in the streets for want of proper accommodations; and alfo, whether they thought that the indians would ftand upon rights and privileges, if these men were ordered back, and they were to come in their room. After some ferment the billetting took place, as it certainly was a neceffary meafure.

As foon as his lordfhip heard that the transports were arrived, he affembled the governors of the feveral neighbouring colonies, to confult with them on the means of protecting their frontiers, during his abfence on the expedition; nothing was required of them, but to remain on the defensive: and accordingly the plan was fettled with the number of troops which each colony was to furnish, and their deftination fixed. Having difmissed them, his excellency left Philadelphia the 27th of march, having flayed there ten days. But before I proceed, it is neceffary to take notice of a general embargo which lord Loudon laid on all outward bound ships: his lordship thought this was the most likely way to hinder the enemy from getting any intelligence of his defigns; and alfo, that the transports would then the more easily find men to navigate them. The embargo bargo might certainly be productive of those good confequences; but as it was detrimental to the interefts of many private people, particularly the merchants, it occasioned a great clamour; for at that time corn was exceffively fcarce in England, owing in part to a bad crop the last year, and the infamous villainy of the farmers, many of whom kept up large quantities in expectation of a higher price, when the poor were ftarving round about them; the merchants in England wrote over to those in America, to ship off large quantities for them, as there was plenty in the colonies, they accordingly did; but before the veffels could fail, the embargo took place : it occafioned fo much difgust in England and the plantations, that an express was afterwards fent to put it out of the power of the commanders to embargo veffels for Great Britain or Ireland. Although the embargo was of fome ufe, yet, as lord Loudon must know how preffing the wants of England were for corn, it has been thought by many, a bad ftep, although he had the full authority to do it.

During the month of april, his lordfhip was employed in preparing the transports at Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, those for the two former amounting to 90 fail. On the 5th of may, being all met at New York, they received orders to be in readinefs to embark the forces; and fir Charles Hardy, governor of the place, having received his majefty's commission as rear admiral of the blue, hoisted his flag on board the Nightingale. It was now about the time, when they expected admiral Holbourn's fleet at Hallifax; but the commander in chief was very impatient that the men might embark, at laft he ordered that fervice to be performed, which was done between the 22d and 25th, and then failed down to Sandy Hook, where they came to an anchor. On the 5th of June, his excellency embarked on bord the Sutherland, but determined not to fail without out further intelligence, becaufe he had learned before he left New York, from the prifoners of fome french prizes, that they were part of a french merchant fleet, under a convoy of five fhips of the line, defigned for Louisburg. This intelligence was confirmed by an express from Boston, informing, that five french men of war and a frigate had been feen cruifing off Halifax. It was imposfible to proceed to that port with the transports, while so confiderable a force was in their road, and yet to remain any longer at New York, would be lofing fo much time, that the expedition againft Louifburg would become very uncertain; his lordship therefore dispatched two men of war to view the coaft, and fee if they could hear any thing of the french fleet : they foon after returned, but had feen nothing; lord Loudon then finding that to wait any longer, would almost put it out of his power to do any thing that campaign, ventured to fail from New York, with the transports. This was the critical time as it were, on which depended the fate of all our schemes, for had the french fell in with the transports, the confequences would certainly have been dreadful; fo that all depended on admiral Holbourn's being arrived, and by that means having the coaft clear, or elfe lord Loudon's escaping the enemy; however, he arrived fafe at Halifax the 30th, his lordship would never have run fo great a risk, had had it not been for faving time, which became fo exceeding precious, on account of the fleet's not arriving from England, till fo late in the feafon. The forces were foon landed, and encamped at Halifax; but as the ground was rough and incumbered, they were employed in making a parade for exercifes and reviews; and a large garden for furnishing vegetables for the fick and wounded that might happen to be fent home from the fiege, in cafe the intended expedition fhould take place : parties of rangers were alfo fent to patrole in the woods, and feveral prime failing

ing veffels were difpatched to look into the harbour of Louifburg, and to make what difcoveries they were able; in fhort, the general took all poffible methods in his power at this interval, to keep the troops properly employed, and to gain the neceffary intelligence of the ftrength of the enemy. At laft admiral Holbourn, with the fleet and forces from England, arrived at Halifax in the fecond week in july, having been waited for with the utmoft impatience by lord Loudon; and where I fhall leave them for the prefent, and return to lay before the reader what had been transacting in Europe. The war in America, and by fea, was at this time of but little eclat; it was in Germany only, where those great actions which furprife mankind were performed : at the close of the preceding campaign, the king of Pruffia had made the faxon army prifoners, and took up his winter quarters in the heart of Saxony. That monarch was threatened with the immense number of enemies which he expected would attack him this campaign; nor were his expectations groundlefs, for the queen of Hungary having found by the battle of Lowofchutz, that fhe had to deal with an enemy truly formidable, refolved to have more powerful forces against him this campaign; she accordingly assembled an army of 100,000 men, in Bohemia, under the command of prince Charles of Lorrain, affifted by marshal Brown; nor did the empress truft entirely to her own preparations; during the preceding winter the process in the emperor's aulic council was continued against the king of Prussia; and also in the diet of the empire. We may eafily conceive with how much impartiality and justice the proceedings in this court were carried on, when those who feared the king of Pruffia were glad of an opportunity to humble him^{ru} and when the greatest number of them were awed by the power of the house of Austria. His pruffian majefty was condemned for his pretended tended obstinacy; and the fiscal had orders to notify to him, that he was put under the ban of the empire, and adjudged fallen from all the dignities and poffeffions which he held under it. The circles of the empire were ordered to furnish their contingents of men and money, to put this fentence in execution ; but these were collected very flowly, the troops were badly composed, and most probably they would never have been able to act, if it had not been for the affiftance they received from France. The inveteracy of her hungarian majefty did not ftop here, she made requisitions to her allies for the affistance they were obliged by treaty to furnish her with. The czarina had prepared a great army of 60,000 men, under the command of marshal Apraxin, who had began their march in the winter through Lithuania, to attack ducal Pruffia, and equipped a ftrong fleet in the Baltic, to co-operate with her land forces. The french refolving to convince the empress queen how advantageous to her, her connection with the house of Bourbon would be; formed two great armies, which had been drawing together for a confiderable time; the first was composed of 80,000 troops, under the command of marshal de Estrees, which was defigned against the king of Pruffia's Westphalian dominions, in quality of allies to the empress queen, and guardians of the liberties of Germany, and to no other intent, as they pretended; but it was really defigned to reduce Hanover alfo. The other french army was commanded by the prince de Soubife, confifting of about 25,000 men; and was defigned to ftrengthen the army of the empire. Thefe were not the only enemies of the king of Pruffia : the king of Sweden, though allied both in blood and inclination to his pruffian majefty, was yet obliged by the fenate to fend troot against him; they were infpired with the hopes of recovering their ancient poffeffions in Germany, and what made them pufh pußh the defign of making war against that monarch the more briskly, was the subsidies of french gold which circulated amongst them plentifully. The duke of Mecklenburg also declared, that he would join the swedish army with 6000 men; for which conduct he has fince paid very feverely.

This was the flate of the enemies of the king of Pruffia, a mighty confederacy, confifting of five of the most powerful kingdoms in Europe; let us next fee the measures which that monarch took to fave himself from being crushed with their numerous forces:

The ruffians had brought no forage with them, trufting to what they fhould find in their march through Poland; but his pruffian majefty, who was informed of the condition of his enemy, bought up all the corn and forage in their march towards Pruffia, which put them to inconceivable difficulties, and retarded their march extremely; it certainly was a fine ftroke of the king of Pruffia to diffrefs them. His majefty appointed general Lehwald to command an army of 30,000 men againft Apraxin. But it was againft the auftrians that the greateft efforts were to be made; his pruffian majefty commanded one army himfelf, in Saxony; the prince of Bevern another in Lufatia; and marfhal Schwerin, a third in Silefia.

But before his majefty made the grand attack upon Bohemia, he took the wifeft meafures in Saxony, in cafe of bad fuccefs in his expedition againft the auftrians. New works were added to the old ones at Drefden, and the greateft diligence ufed to put it in a refpectable pofture of defence; all the burghers were difarmed, and their arms deposited in the arfenal. The auftrian detachments began in april to appear on the frontiers of Saxony, to obferve the motions of the prufilians, but many of them were taken prifoners; thefe triffing matters did not take off the attention of the prufilians; every thing was preparing with (208) with the greatest expedition to begin the campaign, and troops were in motion throughout Saxony, Voigtland, and Lusatia.

About the middle of april, three great bodies of his pruffian majefty's troops entered Bohemia by different routs. Marfhal Schwerin penetrated into it from Silefia, through the county of Glatz, on the 18th, at the head of 50,000 men. His highnefs the duke of Bevern did the fame, from Zittau in Lufatia the 20th, entering Bohemia at Graenstein, taking the rout of Reichenberg. His majefty himfelf, at the head of a third army, marched towards Egra. The austrians imagined, that his prufian majefty had fome diffinct plan of action, independent of his other armies, and accordingly prince Charles detatched 20,000 men, under the command of the duke d'Aremberg, to watch his motions.

The march of the prince of Bevern foon brought on an action; in his march towards Reichenberg, he drove away the enemy from all their pofts. The fame morning, a party of his huffars defeated fome hundred of auftrians, commanded by prince Lichtenstein, who were posted before Kohlig. The 21st at break of day, the pruffians marched in two columns by Habendoff, towards the auftrian army, posted near Reichenberg, 28,000 ftrong, and commanded by count Konigleg; as foon as the pruffian lines were formed, they marched towards their enemy's cavalry, which was ranged in three lines, of about 30 fquadrons, their two wings were fuftained by the infantry, which was posted among felled trees and entrenchments. The pruffians immediately cannonaded the auftrian cavalry, who received it bravely, having on their right a village, and on their left a wood, where they had entrenched themfelves with felled trees and pits. But the prince of Bevern having caufed 15 Iquadrons of dragoons of his fecond line to advance, and ordered the wood on his right to be attacked by fome fome battalions of grenadiers, entirely routed the ene-my's cavalry : the generals Norman, Katt, and the prince of Wurtemberg fignalizing themfelves extremely. The pruffian huffars diftinguished themfelves by the warm reception they gave the auftrian horse grenadiers; notwithstanding their artillery took them in flank. Lieut. gen. Leftewitz, at the fame time attacked with the pruffian left wing, the enemy's redoubts, which covered Reichenberg; though there were many defiles and rifing grounds to pafs, which were all occupied by the enemy; yet the regiment of Darmstadt forced the redoubt, and put to flight, and purfued the auftrians, after fome difcharges of their artillery and fmall arms, from one eminence to another, for the diftance of a mile, as far as Rochlitz and Dorffel. In short, the prussians gained a complete victory; the battle began at fix o'clock in the morning, and continued till eleven. His highness the duke of Bevern, shewed great courage and military skill. The loss of the austrians was confiderable; three flandards were taken, and all their cannon and ammunition waggons.

Nor was marshal Schwerin less successful. He entered Bohemia with his troops in five columns, driving the auftrians before him, as he passed the defiles, marching with incredible celerity, he reached Konigfhoff on the Elbe, the 20th. At Trautenau, two auftrian generals, and the princes Xavier and Charles of Saxony narrowly escaped falling into his hands. He made himfelf master of the circle of Buntlau without oppofition, feizing a great magazine of corn and meal, belonging to the austrian army. He foon after joined his body of troops to those of the prince of Bevern, who, after the battle of Reichenberg, had advanced towards Prague, by the king's orders.

I left his majefty himfelf near Egra, oppofed by the duke of Aremberg, with 20,000 men ; by a masterly stroke of generalship, he made a movement to to the left, which cut off all communication between d'Aremberg's detachment, and the main army of the auftrians; and pushing his advantage, he advanced with prodigious expedition towards Prague, where he joined marshal Schwerin, and the prince of Bevern.

Prince Charles of Lorrain's army confifted of about 95,000 men, being joined by an army from Moravia, the remains of that corps which was beat by the prince of Bevern, and by feveral regiments of the garrifon of Prague. It had taken post on the banks of the Moldau, near that city, in a camp almost inaccessible, with his left wing inclining to the mountain of Zifcha, and his right towards Sterboholi, where he waited on the hill the approach of the pruffian army. But the king, who had paffed the Moldau, with defign to attack them, refolved to turn the enemy's camp; for which purpofe, his army defiled by Potfchernitz, towards the left, which count Brown perceiving, defiled by his right, to avoid being taken in flank. The pruffians marched beyond Bichowitz, traverling defiles and moraffes, which feparated their infantry a little: this infantry having made its attack too precipitately, was the first time repulsed; but they made a fresh attack, and forced the enemy on the right. The pruffian cavalry on the left, after three charges obliged the auftrian cavalry on the right of their army to fly. The pruffian centre routed the infantry, and pufhed quite through the authrian camp. The left of the pruffian army then marched directly towards Michelly, where it was joined by the ca-valry and cut off the auftrian army, whofe right was running away towards Safzawa. The right of the pruffians immediately attacked the left of general Brown, and fucceffively feized on three batteries on different eminences. From every advantage of fituation the ardour of the pruffians in this battle drove the enemy, encouraged by the prefence of their fovereign, and filled with a noble enthusias of bravery, which generally enfures fuccefs. The filefian army, which was was lead to action by marshal Schwerin, had a very rude shock to fustain; having moraffes to pass, precipices to climb, and batteries to face, nothing but the prefence of the king could have animated his troops in general to have performed fuch prodigies of valour. Some regiments of prussian horse, in the beginning of the action, suffered severely. The foot had still greater difficulties to furmount than the horfe; many generals followed the example of the first field marshal, by difmounting, and leading their regiments fword in hand, through marshes, over precipices, and and across 1000 fires. It was here that the brave marshal Schwerin was killed, at the head of his regiment, with the colonel's standard in his hand : The lofs of fo experienced a foldier, was almost a balance to a victory; yet the enemy alfo fuffered a great lofs, in the death of marshal Brown, who was wounded, but not mortally, had not his regret made his wound fatal. Never was victory more complete than this of Prague; 40,000 of the enemy threw themfelves into that city, and the reft fled towards Bennefchau; a vast number was slain, and near 10,000 taken prifoners; the camp, military cheft, 250 cannon, and all the trophies of the completeft victory fell into the hands of the conquerors. This famous battle was fought the 6th of may.

His pruffian majefty having gained fo decifive a victory, convinced the world that he knew how to improve it : he inftantly invefted Prague, and an army within its walls : the king divided his forces into two bodies, marfhal Keith commanded one, which invefted the little town on this fide the Móldau; and the king in perfon with the other, blocked up the old city, on the other fide the river. As it was defended by a complete army, it was impoffible to take it by affault; yet the immenfe garrifon made it probable, that famine would oblige them to furrender; but the king of Pruffia refolved not to P 2 trust folely even to this, but made great preparations to bombard the city; the redoubts and batteries being in good forwardness by the 23d of may, the auftrians made a well conducted and defperate fally with 10,000 men: they attacked a battery which was not finished, but were repulsed several times, the action lafting three hours; but at day break they 1etired into the city, in fome confusion, not being able to make any impression on the prussian posts; their defign was, alfo to have burnt the bridges of communication on the Moldau. His highnets the prince of Bevern commanded, during the fiege, an army of 20,000 men to cover it. On the 29th of may, at night, after a most dreadful storm of rain and thunder, on the fignal of a rocket, four batteries, which discharged every 24 hours, 288 bombs, besides a vaft multitude of red hot cannon balls, began to pour destruction on that unfortunate city, which was foon in flames in every part; we may conceive the horrors that reigned in Prague, from this bombardment, when 12,000 horfes without forage were ranged in the ftreets and squares. This terrible bombardment continued without intermission: on the 10th of june, a red hot cannon ball fet the city on fire near the Moldau, burnt five hours, and entirely confumed the fecond quarter of the new city. In the evening the fire broke out again, and the wind blowing hard, fpread very faft, levelling every thing for feveral hundred yards. The bombardment continued inceffantly night and day, fo that the fire was no fooner quenched in one part, than it broke out in another; the befiegers often feeing it burning in feven or eight places at once. The principal magistrates, burghers, and clergy, feeing their city on the point of being reduced to an heap of rubbish, made the most moving fupplications to the commander to liften to terms. But he was deaf to their prayers, and hanged up two of their fenators, who were more importunate than

than the reft. On the 6th of june, 12,000 useless mouths were driven out of the city; and the pruf-fians forced them in again. The fury of the bombardment continued, and it was thought that the city could not hold out much longer. Let us here for a moment confider the fituation of the affairs of the empress queen. By gaining two battles, her enemy was in poffession of half Bohemia; a whole army, and the capital of that kingdom was on the point of furrendering to him ; to conclude all, her remaining troops were terrified with former defeats. Such was the flate of her affairs, when a general, till then unknown, began to turn the fortune of the war.

This was Leopold count Daun, who never hadcommanded in chief before. One thing remarkable concerning him, was, that although he was of a very noble family, yet his rife in the imperial fervice was owing merely to his merit, without being obliged to any court favour for his promotions. He had gained experience in various parts of Europe, under the greatest generals, and in the most illustrious scenes of action.

This commander had for fome time been collecting the fcattered remains of the auftrian army; and brought them within a few miles of Prague, always taking care to encamp on fuch inacceffible eminences, that it was impossible to attack him; at the fame time, he made feveral falfe attacks on the outward pofts of the pruffians, with his huffars, which were opposed by detachments from the prince of Bevern's army. At last marshal Daun drew into the important camp at Colin, with defign to embarrafs the pruffians. The king knowing how much that fituation would accomplifh Daun's defigns, fearing that he would cut off the prince of Bevern's communication with the army round Prague, and hearing that he was actually near 60,000 ftrong, refolved to diflodge him; with P 3 this this intention, he left the camp before Prague, the 13th of june, to take the command of that corps, in his road he was joined by feveral detachments, fo that the whole number of his army was about 32,000 men. On the 18th, about three in the afternoon, his majefty attacked the auftrians, fo much fuperior in numbers to his own troops, and entrenched in one of the most advantageous fituations that could be chofen, defended by an immense artillery. Let it be fufficient to fay, that the king of Pruffia did every thing on this occasion, that the most impetuous and best regulated courage, assisted by that noble emulation, infpired by the remembrance of fo many victories, could fuggeft. The pruffians returned to the attack feven times, and never fought with greater bravery. Both the king's brothers were in the field, and did every thing that could be expected from them. At last his majesty, at the head of his cavalry, made one furious and concluding charge; but all was unfuccessful. In fhort, his majefty was obliged to draw off his troops; having suffered very severely in the action, but more fo from defertions, and all the ill confequences of a defeat. We must attribute the lofs of this battle to the want of infantry and artillery, and fighting on a ground, where the foot could not be fuftained by the horfe; befides thefe, the advantageous fituation of the enemy, fo much more numerous than the pruffians, their vaft artillery, the great bravery they shewed in the action, and the courage and skill of marshal Daun, all conspired to render the great efforts of the pruffians ufelefs *.

* Soon after this battle, his prufian majefly wrote the following billet to one of his generals :

" I have no real to complain of the bravery of my troops, or the experience of my officers. I alone was in the fault, and I hope to repair it." This noble and candid manner of owning his faults, raifed the king's character as an hero more than ever.

Although

majefty was obliged to raife the fiege of Prague directly; marshal Keith decamped from his fide the 20th, and the whole army prepared with expedition to retire into Saxony. By the 16th of july the pruf-fian army was encamped at Leitmaritz, and the head quarters of the auftrians at Nifmes; the pruffian army were masters of the Elbe. On the 21st he quitted this camp, croffed the Elbe, and encamped at Lowofitz ; in its way to Linai; the 24th, he took post at Nollendorf, leaving marshal Keith at the head of 25,000 men, to guard the passes that lead from Bohemia to Saxony. During the retreat of the prussian army, their rear and out parties were continually infefted with the auftrians; but fuffered little from them. The 26th, the king and his brother prince Henry arrived with the army in the neighbourhood of Pirna, where they encamped. The prince of Pruffia had retreated into Lufatia with another part of the army. The auftrians followed him, and the latter end of july, laid the town of Zittau in afhes, by a dreadful bombardment; obliging the garrifon to furrender. The prince of Pruffia was then in danger of being furrounded by the enemy, who were increafing in Lusatia every day; but to prevent this, his pruffian majefty left the camp near Pirna, the begining of august, crossed the Elbe, and marched with part of his army to his affiftance, leaving the remainder under marshal Keith, to guard the passes of the mountains of Bohemia. By making this forced march, the prince's army was relieved, and the au-firians obliged to retire to their pofts on the right : here I fhall leave his majefty for the prefent.

The battle of Colin was fought at a most critical moment. The king, who before that expected to be master of Prague, and all Bohemia, in a few days, P 4 was was obliged to raife the fiege with lofs, and was driven out of that kingdom, which, a little time before he expected to conquer. Had his majefty only continued the fiege with vigor, and let the prince of Bevern have watched Daun; or, had he but taken a more numerous army to fight him, how different a face would this campaign have wore.

Motions of the French. Their army pass the Rhine and Weser. Army of observation marches. Battle of Hastenbeck. Convention of Closter-seven. Russians enter Prussia. Battle of Norkitten. King of Prussia marches into Lusatia. Offers the austrians battle. Marches into Saxony. Austrians attack general Wintersteldt. Swedes enter Pomerania. General Haddick lays Berlin under contribution. Russians retire. Swedes retire. Schweidnitz taken. Battle of Breslau. Breslau taken. Bad state of the king of Prussia.

I Obferved before, that the french court had refolved to fend two armies into Germany, in quality of allies to the empress queen. The principal one was really defigned against the electorate of Hanover, confifting of 80,000 of the choicest troops of France, commanded by marshal de Estrees, having under him M. de Contades, Mr. Chevert, and the count de St. Germain, officers of reputation; Munfter was fixed upon for the head quarters, and the army was in full march in the latter end of april, when it croffed the Rhine. The other body of french troops was commanded by the prince de Soubife, which, as I before faid, was defigned to ftrengthen the army of the empire. But before it paffed the Rhine, it made itself mafter of Cleves, Meurs, and Guelders, belonging to the king of Pruffia, laying the country under heavy contributions. In the mean time, the army under marshal de Estrees continued its rout by flow marches towards the electorate of Hanover; and to oppose him, the army of observation, which his britannic majefty raifed, commanded by his royal highnefs the duke of Cumberland, was affembled by the beginning of may, and confifted of about 40,000 hanoverians.

hanoverians, and heffians; the part of Westphalia between the Rhine and the Wefer is rough and barren, and very difficult to fubfift an army in, especially fuch a one as d'Eftrees's, which was encumbered with a vaft quantity of baggage, and a multitude of ufelefs mouths. The duke of Cumberland threw all the obftacles in his way that was poffible, but they were overcome by the abilities of the french general; who, by his fuperiority of numbers, obliged the duke to pass the Wefer, and passed it after him the beginning of july. D'Eftrees was no fooner on the other fide. of the Wefer, than he laid all the neighbouring ftates. and country under exceffive contributions : the landgraviate of Heffe Caffel was the first that fuffered. Minden on the Wefer, and Gottingen on the Leine, received french garrifons, without opposition. The french general, from his camp at Stadt-Oldendorf, fent to the regency of Hanover a requisition, dated the 21ft of july, demanding, that deputies should be fent to their head quarters, to treat about contributions, &c. About this time, the duke of Cumberland, who was encamped near Hamelen, marched from thence by Vorenburg, and Haftenbeck towards Halle; and the better to obferve the motions of the enemy, and if poffible, to ftop their progress; his royal highness, on the 19th of july, detached lieut. general Zaftrow, with 12,000 men, to feize the important pass of Stadt-Oldendorf; but he came too late, the french being already in poffeffion of it : Zaftrow then by a forced march rejoined the duke's army, at Latford, on the Wefer. On the 20th, d'Eftrees advanced with his whole army into the fine plain at Stadt-Oldeldorf; and the next day encamped at Halle; on the 24th, the french drove the hanoverian parties from the village of Latford; and the duke perceiving it was the intention of the enemy to attack him, drew up his army on the height between the Wefer and the woods, with his right towards that river, and his left close to the

the wood, the village of. Haftenbeck being in his front. In the evening he withdrew all his out pofts, and the army laid on their arms all night. The 25th in the morning, the enemy appeared, marching in columns, as if they intended to attack the hanoverians, and cannonaded them very feverely the whole day, with an artillery much fuperior to the duke's : that night the army also laid on their arms. At five the next morning, the cannonade began again, with great fury, upon a hanoverian battery, fupported by the heffian infantry and cavalry, who flood the brunt of the fire with incredible bravery, and steadinefs. At feven in the evening, the firing of fmall arms began on the hanoverian left; the cannonading continuing for 6 hours, all the while without inter-The duke had placed fome grenadiers in miffion. the wood, who finding that great numbers of the enemies troops were marching about them, retired and joined the left of the army, on which the french poffeffed themselves of the hanoverian battery on the left, without opposition. It was here that the hereditary prince of Brunfwic diftinguished himself, by attacking and repulsing a superior force of the enemy, and retaking the battery. The french being in poffeffion of a height that flanked both the duke's lines of infantry, he ordered the army to retreat, which was done in good order, to Hamelen. It was confidently faid, that his royal highness had won the battle, but did not know it; thus far is certain, that the french who marched into the woods of Lauenftein, were feized with a pannic, fuppofing they were ready to be attacked by the hanoverians, and fired on one another; and if their confternation had been known, and a well regulated attack had been made on that part of their army, it would probably have been defeated. It was afferted politively, that de Eftrees had word brought him from all quarters, that the enemy appeared on the right and left, and were going going to flank him, which determined him to alter his difpolition.

The duke of Cumberland, from Hamelen, retreated to Hoya, where he encamped; but moved to Verden, on the 12th of august. On the 6th of that month, marshal d'Estrees refigned his command, to marshal duke de Richelieu, who superfeded him, by means of madam de Pompadour's interest with the king of France. Richelieu advanced fast upon the hanoverians; the duke of Cumberland retreated towards Stade: and Bremen opened its gates to the conqueror. By the beginning of september, the duke was encamped under the cannon of Stade.

By his royal highness's retreating after the battle of Haftenbeck, into the dutchy of Bremen, he was cooped up without a poffibility of efcaping from the french, unless there had been a fleet of fhips ready at Stade, to have embarked his army for England, where they would have done no good; but if the duke had retired towards Magdeburg, his army would have been of great fervice to the caufe, by joining the troops of the king of Pruffia, and once more opposing the french; for it was to be expected, that they would not content themfelves with the poffeffion of Hanover, but would march against the king of Pruffia, as foon as poffible. The plan which his royal highness followed, had very different confequences. Under the mediation of the king of Denmark, the remarkable convention of Clofter-Seven was figned, the 8th of september, by which 38,000 hanoverians laid down their arms, and had quarters affigned them by the french general, in, and round about Stade, out of which they were not to move. The troops of Heffe, Brunfwic *, and Saxe-Gotha, were fent back to their respective countries, and disposed of as it was agreed between their fovereigns, and the king of France.

Hiftory,

Hiftory, I believe, can hardly produce a cafe parallel to this. That an army of above 40,000 fhould, by a convention, and without fighting, lay down their arms, and become prifoners of war, (only under a different name) is really to me aftonifhing. All the remarks I fhall add on this unaccountable affair are, that the king of Pruffia this campaign, with 32,000 men attacked marfhal Daun with 60,000 and fought that defperate battle I have before fpoke of : with 25,000 the fame monarch afterwards gained the battle of Rofbach, againft 50,000 french, &cc. and laftly, the battle of Minden was gained by 40,000 men againft 95,000 french. So much depends on the commander of an army ! But to quote more inftances of this nature would be tedious; his royal highnefs the duke's abilities have before been difplayed in the plains of Fontenoy, more confpicuoufly than it is in my power to paint them.

The french army having thus glorioufly ended the campaign in Hanover. Marshal Richelieu marched his troops towards the dominions of the king of Pruffia. I before observed, that besides this army, the french fent another into Germany, under the prince de Soubife; which joined the troops of the empire, and were in full march to attack the king of Pruffia. I shall leave the operations of these two armies for the present, and turn towards another quarter, where we shall find new enemies advancing against his pruffian majesty.

The ruflian army of 80,000 men, had been advancing by dilatory marches for fome time, under the field marfhal Apraxin. They had got no further than Wilna, by the 6th of june, in their way towards Kowno, the general rendezvous. And at the fame time, fome ruffian cruifers blocked up the ports of Konigfberg, and Memel. However, in the begining of july, the ruffians made themfelves mafters of Memel; they then divided their forces, one body being ing commanded by Apraxin himfelf, and the other by general Fermor. Marshal Lehwald, at the head of about 30,000 pruffians, commanded in Pruffia; the 14th of july he quitted his camp at Insterburg, and encamped in the neighbourhood of Welaw, with defign to cover Konigsberg. The russian general fent numerous detachments over most parts of Prussia, burning and deftroying the country with the moft horrid barbarity. Lehwald finding himfelf not ftrong enough to cover the country, and protect it from the favage enemy, refolved to attack their main army, in its entrenchments; which he did on the 30th of auguft. The ruffian army amounting to 80,000 regu-lars, was entrenched in a most advantageous camp, near Norkitten. It was composed of four lines, each of which was defended by an entrenchment, with a numerous artillery, and batteries placed on all the eminences. Lehwald's army hardly confifted of 30,000 The attack began at 5 in the morning, and men. was carried on with fo much vigor, that the pruffians entirely broke the whole first line of the enemy, and forced all their batteries. The ruffian cavalry was routed, and a regiment of grenadiers cut in pieces. But when marshal Lehwald came up to the fecond entrenchment, feeing that he could not attempt to carry it without expofing his whole army, took the refo-lution to retire, which he did in excellent order, without the enemy's ever ftirring out of their entrenchments to purfue him. The lofs of the pruffians did not exceed 3000 men; but it was very evident, that the ruffians muft have loft four times as many, although conquerors; the pruffians loft 11 pieces of can-Lehwald, after the battle, returned to his camp non. at Welaw; but in a few days changed its pofition, encamping at Peterswalde. That great general, though defeated, was more formidable, after the battle, to the ruffians, than they were to him; he maintained his pofts, and kept them from advancing.

In

In the mean time the king of Pruffia was very hard pushed himself. I left him just retired into Saxony, after the unfortuaate battle of Collin. Finding that the auftrian army made the greatest efforts towards Lufatia; the prince of Pruffia, at the head of his army, had posted himself near Waltersdorf, to cover the country; but, as marshal Daun advanced very brifkly towards him, he was in danger of being furrounded : upon which, the king, who was near Drefden with his army, croffed the Elbe, the latter end of july, and advanced to the affiftance of the prince his brother, whole army, with this reinforcement, then amounted to 45,000 men; leaving 25,000 men under marshal Keith, at Lenai, on the other fide of the The king marched to Bautzen, where he join-Elbe. ed the prince. By his majefty's orders, marshal Keith marched from Lenai through Drefden, with 20 battalions and 40 squadrons, croffed the Elbe, and joined him at Bautzen, leaving prince Maurice of Anhalt Deffau, with 12 battalions and 10 fquadrons encamped at Pirna, to check the incursions of the austrian regulars. The king's army, after the junction with Keith, confifted of 60,000 men, he marched the 30th of july from Bautzen, towards Gorlitz, upon which, the auftrians retired from Labau, encamping between Gorlitz and Zittau. The king having made feveral motions, took post on the 15th of august at Budin. It was here that he had continual advices of the approach of the army of the empire, and the french under Soubise, towards Saxony; as they advanced very fast, he refolved to leave Lusatia, and march his army against them; but as he wanted extremely first to fight the austrians, he endeavoured by all poffible means to bring them to a battle; on the 16th, he drew up his army within fight of the auftrians. The next day he reconnoitred their fitua. tion; and, to leave nothing undone that might bring on an action, he sent general Winterfeldt, with 16,000 men.

men, on the other fide of the Neiffe, to try to take them in flank. Finding it impossible to draw them to a battle, he fuddenly decamped, leaving the prince of Bevern, prince Ferdinand, and general Winterterfeldt, with 30,000 men near Gorlitz, to obferve the austrians. His majesty took the road to Dresden, where he arrived the 29th, in his way towards Erfurth, with design to fight the french and imperialists.

No fooner was his majefty gone, but the auftrians came out of their camp, and began to fhew themfelves every where. On the 17th of feptember, 15,000 auftrians attacked two battalions of Winterfeldt's army, which they cut in pieces; and, as the general was marching to their affiftance, he received a wound of which he foon after died. The lofs of fo brave a general, was the greatest which the pruffians fustained on this occafion. Indeed, the king of Pruffia was at this time very hard preffed by his enemies; in the beginning of this month, 22,000 fwedes penetrated into pruffian Pomerania, and laid the neighbouring country under contribution. Berlin itfelf was also in danger, from another quarter. General Haddick with a large detachment of troops from the austrian army at Gorlitz, by forced marches pierced through Lufatia, part of Brandenburg, and prefented himfelf before Berlin, on the 16th of october; the next day, the city paid him a contribution of 200,000 crowns, on which he retired precipitately, on hearing that prince Maurice was advancing against him. The prince fet out from Torgau the 15th, and arrived at Berlin on the 18th, only one day too late.

The ruffians, in the mean time, after exercifing fuch barbarities, as would fhock humanity to relate them, made a most precipitate retreat out of Pruffia; they began their march the 13th of feptember, leaving their fick and wounded to the amount of near 10,000 men; they gained three marches on Lehwald, fo that, although he difpatched prince George of Holftein, with 10,000 men to purfue them, they were got too far. They took their rout through Lithuania, towards Ruffia. This retreat enabled marfhal Lehwald to turn his arms againft the fwedes; he not only recovered that part of pruffian Pomerania which the enemy had-conquered; but alfo, all fwedifh Pomerania, except the town of Stralfund; leaving their ally, the duke of Mecklenburg, to feel the weight of the pruffian arms. This nation did nothing to make them worthy of their warlike anceftors, who had fo often been the terror of Germany.

His pruffian majefty's affairs wore a more melancholy face in Silefia. The king was no fooner gone. into Saxony, than the auftrians poured into that province, from all quarters. One body of them had opened the trenches before Schweidnitz the 27th of october; and it did not capitulate before the 11th of november. The prince of Bevern was encamped near Breflau, to watch the motions of prince Charles, with the main army, who was near him. On the taking of Schweidnitz (with a garrifon of 4000 men) the army which befieged it, joined prince Charles and marshal Daun, near Breslau, when it was determined to attack the prince of Bevern in his intrenchments, under the walls of that city, which was executed the 22d of november, with a treble fuperiority of numbers. The pruffians fuftained their attack with amazing intrepidity. The auftrians loft near 20,000 men. A great part of their army had retired from the field of battle, and the reft were preparing to retire; when all at once the pruffian generals took the fame refo-lutions. A part of their army had fuffered a great deal in the engagement. They became apprehenfive of a total defeat, in cafe their intrenchments should be forced in any part. Accordingly they retired be-hind the Oder. Soon after the auftrians returned, and with amazement faw themfelves mafters of the field of battle, which they had but just been obliged to relinquish. There certainly was fomething very ambiguous in the conduct of the pruffian generals in Silefia; the king found the want of old marshal Schwerin more than ever. One thing, to appearance, was very remarkable, and gave rife to a thousand conjectures; the prince of Bevern, two days after the battle, as he was reconnoitring without efcort, and attended only by a groom, was taken by an advanced party of croats, a small body of whom had passed the Oder. The auftrians immediately improved their victory; their advantage, though very dearly bought, was followed by many others; Breflau capitulated the 24th; and here they found, as at Schweidnitz, vast quantities of provision, ammunition, and mo-Almost all Silesia was on the point of falling ney. into their hands. Indeed, the fituation of his pruffian majefty at this time, was terrible. Part of Pruffia laid wafte by the brutal ferocity of the ruffians; part of Pomerania by the fwedes : all his weftphalian dominions, together with Halberstadt, and part of Magdeburg, in the poffeffion of the french, who were making incurfions even into Brandenburg : Berlin itfelf laid under contributions; Silesia conquered by the auftrians; and laftly, Saxony and Lufatia partly eat up by the auftrians, and the army of the empire, joined with the french. Such was the flate of this monarch's dominions. For the prefent we must leave him, marching to defend Saxony, against the prince of Soubife.

I N the mean time, the english were pluming them-felves with the victories of their illustrious ally; they won none themfelves. The ministry was difliked, and their administration weak and confused; in fhort, we must not rank the year 1757 as glorious in the annals of Britain. Several fleets had been ordered out to cruife, in expectation of meeting with french ships; but they were generally unfuccessful: Admiral Bofcawen in june, commanded one, which cruifed at cape St. Vincent; admiral Townshend arrived from Jamaica, where he had been very fuccefsful against the small craft of the french. But these actions are not of any great eclat, nor of any great confe-quence in themfelves. The transactions in the british parliament, were indeed, of more importance. In confequence of feveral fpeeches and meffages from his majesty, they had at different times, between january and Q 2 and may, granted his majefty, for the year 1757, upwards of 8,350,000 l.*.

In the month of june, there happened an unexpected change in the englifh miniftry, which will juftly be reckoned a remarkable æra, in the englifh hiftory. A coalition of parties was hardly hoped for; but yet it was brought about. Mr. Pitt was again reftored to the office of fecretary of ftate; the duke of Newcaftle was placed at the head of the treafury, and Mr. Fox was appointed pay-mafter of the forces. This arrangement gave very general fatisfaction : the nation were fanguine in their hopes of better fuccefs in the war, now the violence of parties were extinguifhed, and the new miniftry formed a fcheme to gratify this eager defire. It is now time to give fome account of it.

As one captain Clerk was returning from Gibraltar, in his way to England, in 1754; he came along the weftern coaft of France. And by the politenefs of the governor of Rochefort, was fhewn the dock, fortifications, and every thing elfe in that city. In july, 1757, he was ordered to communicate, to fir John Ligonier, what obfervations he had made there; he accordingly wrote him an account of the fortifications, reprefenting them fo bad, that the miniftry refolved to undertake an expedition againft it; and were determined in this refolution, on feeing an authentic account of the military force of France, which they alfo received in july, By this it appeared, that the french army, in the beginning of the war, confifted only of 157,347 men, including militia. In auguft, 1755, an augmentation was made of 29,000 foot, and 2500 dragoons. In december following, 5500 horse were further raifed. It also appeared by this memorial, that, in july 1757, the whole french army (without reckoning the militia and invalids, which were about 67,000) was under 200,000 men. The iflands of Minorca, Corfica, with America, and the Weft-Indies, took up 30,000 men. Mashal d'Estree's army, if the regiments were complete, would amount to 92,000; Richelieu's to 32,000; a body of 6 or 7000 in garrifon at Toulon, Marfeilles, &c. By which it appears, that there were 160,000 regular troops employed, 40,000 then remained for garrifons, from Sedan to the frontiers of Switzerland, without fpeaking of Flanders, and the coast, 20,000 from St. Vallery to Bergue, and 10,000 more from St. Vallery to Bourdeaux.

From this memorial, it appeared to the ministry, that the particular ports on the western coast of France must be very weakly garrifoned. A confiderable inducement to undertake the expedition. Sir Edward Hawke received his orders in the beginning of august, and in consequence repaired to Spithead, to colleft the fhipping together. In the fecret infructions to him, and fir John Mordaunt, the general of the land forces, they were directed to make their attack upon Rochfort; and in cafe it fucceeded, or failed, Port l'Orient, or Bourdeaux were next to be confidered; as the most important objects of their arms. A camp had been formed in the ifle of Wight, ever fince the beginning of august, confisting of the old buffs, the king's, Kingsley's, Hume's, Hodson's, Brudenel's, Loudon's, Cornwallis's, Amhurst's, and Bentinck's regiments of foot, containing 700 men each complete, which in all was 7000, with two battalions of marines, and one troop of light horfe. These forces were embarked on board 45 transports, convoved Q_3 convoyed by a grand fleet * of men of war. This noble armament failed the 8th of feptember. On the 20th, they made the isle of Oleron, in the bay of Bifcay, over against Rochfort. The 23d, they came in fight of the little island of Aix, which lies in the mouth of the river, leading up to Rochfort. Capt. Howe, by order of the admiral, in the Magnanime, attacked the fort on this island. Lord B --- m. who went a volunteer +, in another ship of the squadron, has fince told me, that although the object of Mr. Howe's attack was but inconfiderable, yet his conduct in it was admirable. The french, when he came within gun-fhot, fired ineffectually at him ; he received their fire, and continued to bear down with the greatest composure, till he dropt his anchors close under the walls of the fort, and then began fo terrible and inceffant a fire, that his ship seemed to be one continued flame; in about an hour, the governor ftruck his flag, when the fmoak cleared up, and difcovered not a fort, but a heap of rubbish.

On the 25th, a council of war was called, by defire of general Mordaunt, to confider of the expedi-

+ This amiable young nobleman, has fince attended the army under prince Ferdinand of Brunfwick, as a volunteer, in two campaigns. He was taken very ill at the latter end of the first, at Cassel, fo that lord Granby defired him not to risk his health by venturing on a fecond campaign; but his lordship's great bravery, and eager inclination to ferve his country, rendered him deaf to all intreatics.

ency of landing to attack Rochfort, in which it was granted by every body, that landing could be effected ; but that the place could not be taken by escalade. The general then defired another, which was held on the 28th, and wherein it was also unanimoufly agreed, that it was adviseable to land the troops with all possible difpatch. Immediately the difpolition was made for the landing, under admiral Broderick, and all the captains; part of the troops were in the boats; when on the 30th, the admiral received a letter from Mr. Broderick, importing, that the generals were come to a refolution not to land that night, but to wait till next morning. Sir Edward Hawke then fent to know of fir John Mordaunt, whether the general officers had any further military operations to propole; that if they had not, he intended to proceed to England with the fquadron without lofs of time : in anfwer to which, fir John informed him, that having TALKED IT OVER with the general officers, they all agreed in returning directly to England; and accordingly, this most formidable armada arrived at St. Hellen's the 6th of october.

Never did there appear fo general a difcontent, as fpread throughout the nation, on the failure of this expedition; it was equalled by nothing, but the ardent expectations of fuccess before the fleet failed. One party threw all the blame on the minifters, who planned the scheme. The other laid all the fault on the commanders, who ought to have executed it. But his majefty, by his warrant of the 1st of november, appointed a board of general officers, to enquire into the caufes of the failure of the expedition ; they met the 12th, and by their report, affigned feveral reafons, why the expedition failed ; which reafons were fo many absolute censures on the conduct of the com-The general officers were, the duke of mander. This determination of the board of enquiry, was far from being fatisfactury to his majefty; by another warrant, dated the 3d of december, a general court marfhal * was appointed to fit upon the trial of fir John Mordaunt, which met the 14th, and continued fitting till the 20th; when they all unanimoufly were of opinion, that fir John Mordaunt was not guilty of the charge exhibited againft him, and did therefore acquit him.

To determine where the fault of the expedition's failing, really laid, is a matter very difficult. We found, that a board of officers cenfured the commander, on account of his behaviour, and a court martial acquitted him; the greater number of the publications, (many of them very flupid ones) we read on this affair, the more we fhall be perplexed. Thus much, I think feems pretty plain; that the fcheme of making a diversion on France, with defign to affift the king of Prufila, by drawing the french troops out of Germany, was a good one; provided there were not troops enough in every part of that coaft. to defend itself. It did not appear that this was not the case at Rochfort; I should also suppose, that the month of feptember was too late for fuch an expedition, efpecially in the boifterous bay of Bifcay. In fhort, the defign was not planned in a perfect manner, by the ministry : and we must fay the fame of the execution ; there were fome miftakes, which joined to the former, rendered it ineffectual. But the ministry certainly deferved praise in one particular (although in fome others, the plan might be defective) in forming a defign to employ with advantage our naval force, in an expedition, which, had it fucceeded. would have been of great confequence, if not by affifting the king of Pruffia, at leaft in deftroying the fource of the naval power of France.

The operations of the british arms in north America were not more brilliant. I left admiral Holbourn just arrived at Hallifax, in the beginning of july, from England with a grand fleet *, and lord

Loudon

Loudon waiting there for him with great impatience. The armament confifted of 17 fhips of the line, 14 frigates and floops, two bombs, one fire fhip, with 179 transports, making 18,000 tons english fhips, and 15,616 north american; 100 pieces of brass cannon, in 10 large fhips, horses, fleers, &c. in four others, and feveral more loaded with facines, gabions, &c. The army confisted of 15 regiments, 500 men of the train, 500 rangers, and 100 carpenters, making all 11,000 effective land forces. The first thing which the commander did, was to dispatch fome veffels for intelligence of the enemy's fituation and ftrength. And in the mean time, the troops were exercised in attacking a fham fort, according to the rules of war, lord Loudon very rightly judging, that this was a proper employment for them till he failed *.

When the veffels returned, they brought advice of a fleet's being arrived at Louifburgh; and, on the 4th of august, a french prize was brought into Halifax, by whose papers it appeared, that there were then in the harbour, 17 fail of the line, 12 frigates, 4000 regulars, besides 3000 belonging to the garrison. This news immediately suspended the preparations which had been made to embark. Councils of war were held one after another. The result of the whole was that as the place was so well reinforced, the french fleet superior to ours, and the feason so far advanced, it was most prudent to defer the enterprize till a more favourable opportunity. I do not fee any great reason to find fault with this determination, confidering the circumftances abovementioned, although it was much found fault with in England. Lord Loudon returned to New York, and the admiral fet fail for Louifburg,

* It was on this account, that lord Charles Hay condemned lord Loudon's conduct, as " Keeping the courage of his majefly's fol-" diers at bay, and expending the nation's wealth, in making fham " fights, and planting cabbages." For which he was, with the advice of a council of war, ordered under arreft. in hopes to bring the french fleet to a battle; but with what reafon, he fhould fuppofe, that they would hazard one, I know not, as their only bufinefs was to protect the town. The english fquadron stayed off the harbour, till the 25th of feptember, when they were fhattered in a most terrible storm, in which one of our ships was lost, eleven difmasted, and the rest returned to England in a very bad condition.

This was the end of the expedition against Louifburg; in which fo great a force was fo ineffectually ufed: we attribute the bad fuccefs to the long delay of Holbourn's fleet in England, it ought certainly to have been ready to fail fooner, and then fo much would not have depended upon the wind and weather. Lord Loudon's conduct has been very much blamed, with what reafon, I confefs, I cannot fee.

The reader may remember, that before general Johnson's victory over the french, there was built a fort, called William Henry, on the south edge of lake George, in order to command that lake, and cover our frontiers. The fort was ftrong at prefent, garrifoned by 2500 men; and general Webb with 4000 men was posted at no great distance. The french, when they were informed that lord Loudon was gone on the Louisburg expedition, made great preparations to attack this fort; the marquis de Montcalm brought against it 8000 regulars and indians, with a very good artillery to befiege it in form. It is here neceffary to enquire, whether Montcalm could do all this fo near Crown Point, without general Webb's knowing it. If he was not informed of it, where were his fcouts, fo neceffary in that country : if he was informed of it, which is the common opinion, why did he not collect the neighbouring militia, and put the fort in the best posture of defence, he would have been of equal, perhaps superior force to the french; but this not being done, the confequences were, that the french after a fix days fiege, took the fort the 9th of auguft ; 2500

guft; it furrendering by the advice of general Webb. The garrifon marched out with their arms, and engaged not to ferve during 18 months; the french favages paid no regard to the capitulation ; but committed a thousand outrageous barbarities. And all was fuffered by 2000 men; with arms in their hands, against a diforderly crew of barbarians. The enemy having demolifhed the fort, carried off every thing with the veffels on the lake, departing without making any further attempts, There is such an intricate darknefs in this affair, that were it cleared up, I fear a ftain would fomewhere be difcovered. This was the end of our third campaign in north America, we had actually near 20,000 regular troops, and a navy of upwards of 20 ships of the line, and yet our forts were taken from us, and our indian allies left defenceless, to the mercy of the enemy; and without our doing any one action, that could repay us for all this load of bad fuccefs and diffionour.

It is in Germany only we must look for more brilliant and decifive actions. I left his pruffian majefty returning from Lufatia, in his way to Saxony, with defign to fight the imperialists and french, who were advancing towards Mifnia. His majefty reached Erfurth, the 14th of feptember, by the rout of Pegau, Naumburg, Frankenau, Buttlestadt; from Erfurth, the king detached prince Ferdinand of Brunfwick with feven battalions and ten fquadrons, and fome artillery, towards Halberstadt; to watch the motions of marshal Richelieu's army. The combined army left Erfurth the 11th, on the approach of the pruffians, and retired to Eifenach, where they were encamped during the king of Pruffia's ftay at Erfurth ; but being reinforced confiderably, they then advanced, and his majefty retired in his turn : the reafon of which was, he wanted to fight them as near Mifna, and as deep in the winter as he could, becaufe, if he was victorious, a defeat at that feafon, would difenable his enemy enemy from acting any more, at least that year: On the contrary, if he failed, Saxony was at hand for him to retire into, and which the enemy could make make little impression on in winter. On the 28th, he marched back to Buttleftadt; on which the combined army fixed their quarters at Gotha. His pruffian majefty finding that the enemy advanced with fpeed, thought it time to fight them : he took that refolution the 24th of october, when his army happened to be divided into feveral corps, fome of them at the diftance of 20 leagues afunder. Marshal Keith was in Leipfick with feven battalions, and his majefty, on being informed that the enemy were marching directly towards that city, collected his whole army together, with fuch expedition, that it was united by the 27th, remaining at Leipfick the 28th and 29th; it was then imagined, that the battle would be fought on the plains of Lutzen. On the 30th, the king drew nigh that place; and paffed the Sala with his army at Weiffenfels, Merfeburg, and Halle, and joined again the 3d, over against the enemy. On the 5th, intelligence was brought the king, that the combined army was in motion ; in . fhort, the two armies met at the village of Rofbach. The latter was commanded by the prince of Saxe Hilburghaufen, and Soubife, and confifted of . 50,000 men complete. The prussians did not amount to 25,000 *.

His

* Just before the battle began, which was to decide the fate of fo many nations, the king of Prufia addressed his troops in the following words:

" My dear friends, the hour is come, in which all that is, and all that ought to be dear to us, depends upon the fwords which are now drawn for the battle. Time permits me to fay but little : nor is there occasion to fay much. You know that there is no labour, no hunger, no cold, no watching, no danger, that I have not fhared with you hitherto ; and you now fee me ready to lay down my life with you, and for you. All I ask is the fame pledge

of

His pruffian majefty had determined to make the attack with one wing only, and the disposition of the enemy made it neceffary, that it fhould be the left wing. All the cavalry of his right, was marched to his left, and formed over against that of the enemy. Upon which the pruffian cavalry moved on immediately, the french cavalry advanced to meet them, and the charge was very fierce, feveral regiments of the french coming on with great refolution. The advantage however, was entirely on the fide of the pruffians. The french cavalry being routed, was purfued for a confiderable time, with the greatest spirit. But having afterwards gained an eminence, which gave them an opportunity of rallying, the pruffian horfe fell on them afresh, and gave them to thorough a defeat, that they betook themfelves to flight in the utmost diforder, which happened at four in the afternoon. Whilft the cavalry charged, the pruffian infantry opened themfelves, enduring a very brifk cannonade from the enemy, which did fome execution; and in about a quarter of an hour their fire began. The french could neither ftand it nor refift the valour of their enemies, who gallantly marched up to their batteries, which being carried one after another, they gave way in the greatest confusion. As the left wing of the pruffians advanced, the right changed its position, and meeting with a finall rifing ground, they planted 16 pieces of heavy artillery, the fire of which taking the left wing of the enemy in front, galled them extremely. At five the victory was decided, the cannon ceafed, and the french fled on all fides. The king of Pruffia ex-

And let me add, not as an incitement to your courage, but as a teffimony of my own gratitude, that from this hour, until you go into quarters, your pay fhall be double. Acquit yourfelves like men, and put your confidence in God." The effect this fpeech had upon the men, amounted almost to an heroic phrenfy, a good prognostication of fucces.

poled himfelf to the hotteft of the fire, in leading on his troops. The french left 3000 men dead on the field of battle; 63 pieces of cannon, a great many colours; eight french generals, 250 officers of different ranks, and 6000 private men were taken. The darknefs of the night, alone faved from total deftruction the fcattered remains of an army, fo numerous and formidable in the morning. The 6th, the conquerors purfued the run-aways to Freyburg, and the 8th and 9th to Erfurth.

His pruffian majefty no fooner had purfued his enemy as far as Erfurth, than he turned back, and began a march of upwards of 200 miles, with that very army, which had before the battle been collected from places above 100 miles diftant from each other. The king made a rapid march through Thuringia, Mifnia, and Lufatia, in his way to fight the auftrians in Silefia. He fet out from Leipfick the 12th of november, with 19 battalions and 28 fquadrons. Whilft this corps was on their march, marfhal Keith, with another, got into Bohemia, through the defiles of Pafsberg; and marched towards Prague, taking a confiderable magazine at Leitmeritz. The two austrian generals Haddick and Marshal, who were posted in Lufatia, to obstruct his majesty's march, fled before him. He arrived the 24th, at Naumburg, on the Queifs, and by making forced marches entered Silefia, and arrived at Parchwitz, near the Oder, the 28th. The prince of Bevern's army joined the king here ; and foon after the garrifon of Schweidnitz, which were conducting to prifon by the auftrians, being but weakly guarded, and hearing by accident of the victory of Rofbach, it annimated them fo much, that they role upon the efcort, difperfed them, and by the greatest chance joined the king's army in its march, adding a confiderable ftrength to it. The royal army having refted a day, marched on the 4th to Neumarck.

The

The auftrians, in the mean time, confiding in their numbers, on his prussian majesty's approach, abandoned their ftrong camp (the fame which the prince of Bevern had before occupied) and advanced to meet the king, with a refolution to give him battle. The two armies met the 5th of december, near the vil-lage of Leuthen : the auftrians were commanded by prince Charles of Lorrain, affifted by marshal Daun, the latter of whom had taken all poffible precautions to throw a multitude of impediments in the way of his pruffian majefty; the ground which they occupied, had all the advantage of natural fituation, improved to the utmost with great diligence and skill: the army was drawn up on a plain, except in some parts it had fmall eminences, which count Daun had furrounded with artillery; fome hills on his right and left were also covered with batteries of cannon; in his front were many thickets and caufeways; but to render the whole as impenetrable as poffible, he had felled a vast number of trees, and scattered them in the way. In this formidable fituation was posted 70,000 austrians, excellent troops, and commanded by count Daun; the only general who had fnatched a victory from the pruffian hero.

(240)

His majefty heffitated not a moment; although his troops did not exceed 36,000 men, he refolved to attack the enemy, fo much fuperior. From the nature of the ground, the pruffian horfe could not act; but by a moft judicious movement of the king's, that difadvantage was overcome; general Nadafti, with a corps de referve, was pofted on the auftrian's left, with defign to take the king in flank; but his majefty, in making his first difpolitions, had forefeen, and guarded against that defign, he placed four battalions behind the cavalry of his right wing. Nadafti, as the king expected, attacked him with great fury, but received fo fevere a fire from those four battalions, that he retired in the greateft diforder;

by

by which means the king's flank being well fupported and covered; acted with fo much order and vigor, that the enemy's right gave way. The pruffian artillery was excellently ferved, and having filenced that of the auftrians, enabled the king to maintain those advantages, which he had gained. Never was battle fought with more obstinacy; the attacks of the pruffians were incredible; and the auftrians made a most gallant defence during the whole battle; they drew up all their forces again about Leuthen, which poft was defended on all fides with redoubts and entrenchments : but nothing could ftop the impetuofity of the pruffians; they made reiterated attacks with the utmost bravey, which their enemies fustained a long time with great firmnefs, but at last the post was gained, and the auftrians fled on all fides, the battle ending in an entire rout. The king purfued them to Liffa; 6000 were flain, 15,000 taken prifoners, 200 pieces of cannon, 60 colours and standards, and 4000 waggons of ammunition and baggage were taken. It is remarkable, that this glorious battle was fought just a month after that of Rosbach.

The fulness of the victory was soon seen in the greatness of its confequences. The austrians were purfued the day after the battle to Breflau; and that city was immediately befieged. Schweidnitz, although it was in the depth of winter, was blockaded : and the pruffian parties over-ran all Silefia, recovering not only that part of it, which belonged to the king, but conquered even the auftrian division, reducing the garrifons of Jagerndorf, Troppau and Tetfchen. In fhort, the empress queen remained poffeffed only of the garrifon of Schweidnitz, in all Silefia; the whole of which country, but a few days before was in the poffeffion of her victorious troops. His majefty the king of Pruffia, having thus glorioufly ended the campaign, distributed his men into winter quarters. The auftrians retired into Bohemia, with R the 70000 feat with 36030 the shattered remains of their troops, where they also went into winter quarters. But it is time to turn our eyes towards another prospect equally advantageous to his prussian majesty.

The french army in Hanover, from the very figning the convention of Clofter-seven, had been guilty of a million of unheard of excesses, and had violated the convention almost in every article. They feized the caftle of Schartzfels, and pillaged it, making the garrifon prifoners of war. They refused to deliver up the prifoners they had made before the convention, though this was a point expressly flipulated between the generals that fettled the detail, and was exactly fulfilled on the part of the hanoverians, by the release of the french prisoners. They summoned the bailies of those districts, into which the french troops were by no means to enter, under pain of military execution, to appear before the french commiffary, and compelled them to deliver up the public revenue. They appropriated to themselves part of those magazines, which by express agreement were to be left to the electoral troops. They feized the houfes, revenues, and corn belong to the king of England, in the city of Bremen, in fpight of the reciprocal engagements entered into, to confider that city, as a place abfolutely free and neutral. The duke de Richelieu, the commander in chief, who came to lofe all that the skill of d'Estrees had won. (being promoted to the chief command merely by the favour of madam de Pompadour, who hated the marshalefs d'Eftrees) was the author of this behaviour. fo injurious to the honour of his country; his fortune, by his extravagance and vices, was very much fhattered; and to repair it, he plundered the whole electorate of Hanover, with the moft inflexible feverity; he levied the most exorbitant contributions; and even that did not exempt the unhappy hanoverians from the infolent and brutal licentiousness of the french foldierv.

foldiery. The capital of the electorate, was the only place which escaped from the universal rapine, by the justice, generosity, and moderation of the duke de Randan its governor, who kept up the strictest difcipline; and behaved with the utmost humanity. Such instances as these, as they happen very rarely, so they ought to be transmitted to posserity to the honour of those who perform them.

There never was a more flagrant inftance of what importance a regular and exact difcipline is to the very being of an army, than in this under the duke de Richelieu. That general, intent only on plunder-ing the country, relaxed every kind of military difcipline; fo that the numerous army, which the conduct of d'Eftrees had preferved in excellent order and good fpirits, through all the deferts of Weftphalia, and against an enemy's army; now it was in poffellion of a plentiful country, without any enemy to oppose it, was reduced in its numbers, the foldiers decayed in their health and fpirits, in vile order, without cloaths, and even without arms. Such was the condition of this once formidable army, when his majefty, the king of Great Britain, refolved no longer to bear the indignities which the infolence of the enemy was every day increasing. The french even went fo far as to attempt taking their arms from the hanoverian and heffian troops; but this was not fuffered. I have before faid, that the king of Pruffia had detached prince Ferdinand of Brunswick with a small army, into the country of Halberstadt, to watch the motions of marshal Richelieu; the prince finding what order the french army was in, penetrated through the northern parts of the electorate, and joined his body of pruffian troops to the army of hanoverians and hestians, who inftantly refumed their arms, and began to act against the french, under prince Ferdinand's command. The king published a memorial, containing the motives which obliged his troops to take arms, R 2 fetting fetting fetting forth in the clearest light, how palpably the french had first broke every article of the convention of Closter-seven.

The prince took the command about the middle of november; by which time the army was wholly affembled. On his first motions, marshal Richelieu threatened the whole country, of which he was in poffeffion, with fire and fword, to which no reply was made. However, on the prince's approach, the fuburbs of Zell was fet on fire, the bridge of the Aller burnt, and many houses reduced to ashes. His ferene highness having represented to marshal Richelieu, the confequences of fuch a proceeding, the marfhal alledged, that it was done my mere accident. The first operation of importance, which the hano-verian army undertook, was the siege of Harbourg, they became masters of the town, the 28th of november, but the french governor with the garrifon retired into the caftle; and defended it with the greateft bravery, till the 29th of december, when he capitulated. Marshal Richelieu, in the mean time, was collecting his troops about Zell. The 6th, the hanoverian army began their march to diflodge him, and arrived within a league of Zell the 13th; but finding that the french were too ftrongly intrenched to be attacked, he staid till the 21st, when he broke his camp, and returned towards Ultzen and Lunenburg, to put his troops into winter quarters.

The wonderful events, which diftinguish in fo remarkable a manner, the year 1757, are such, that the like is hardly to be met with in history. The king of Prussian had once more the happiness to see himself freed from all that imminent danger, which so lately furrounded him; he now felt the effects of his councils, and his labours; all his enemies were driven out of his dominions, defeated, broken, and flying every where before him; himself in quiet possession of Silessian, and his victorious troops ready to fall on their enemies in the next campaign, with redoubled bra-very. Animated with the prefence of their fovereign, what labours are too great for pruffians to perform ? What a wonderful reverse of fortune did this monarch fultain, in fo fhort a fpace of time, as a fingle campaign. Triumphant at first ; the austrians fly before him, totally defeated, and half a kingdom conquered. The lofs of one battle turns the fcale, the king of Prussia is defeated, the affairs of the auftrians re-eftablished, their armies victorious, and their enemy on the very brink of destruction, abandoned by his allies, his dominions plundered, and laid wafte by his enemies, and himfelf at the very edge of defpair. Another battle raifes him again, and in a month's time, the auftrians, imperiliafts, french, ruffians, and fwedes, all retire before him; his dominions are freed from all his enemies; and the force of one fmall potentate baffles all the endeavours of a confederacy of five of the greatest powers in the univerfe. How will posterity be amazed to hear, that above half the power of Europe was united, and exerted in vain, to reduce the king of Pruffia, unaffifted by allies ! fuch are the events that happened; fuch the actions that were performed, not in an age, but in a fingle campaign.

HE year 1758, opened at fo critical a conjunc-ture, that it was very reafonably expected, it would be remarkable for great and important actions. . The belligerent powers of Europe, fpent the winter in making the most formidable preparations, for the enfuing campaign. The immenfe confederacy against the king of Pruffia still sublisted; and every one of the powers that formed it, feemed to be emulous who should be most forward to crush an enemy that was found more powerful, than they at first imagined. England was his only ally, and one whofe affiftance he had reafon to hope would be very advantageous to him. The army which the king of England had under the command of prince Ferdinand of Brunfwick, was of infinite fervice to his prufian majefty; for the french army which opposed it, it is very natural to suppose, had it had no antagonist in Hanoyer, would have marched against that monarch's dominions. It was refolved in England, to keep it in play, against the french, which gave occasion tg.

(247) to a meffage from the king, the 18th of january, to the commons, importing, "That having ordered the army, formed laft year in his electoral dominions, to be put again in motion, and to act with the utmost vigour against the common enemy, in concert with his ally the king of Prussia, and the exhausted and ruined state of the electorate and its revenues, having rendered it impossible for the fame to maintain and keep together that army, until the further neceffary charge of it, &c. could be laid before the house; his majesty found himself under the absolute neceffity of recommending to them, the speedy confideration of such a present supply, as might enable him to subssift, and keep together the faid army." In confequence of this message, the house, on the 23d, voted 100,000 l. for the end therein mentioned.

In England, we find very few events that the compass of this work will admit my speaking of. In parliament were many refolutions, which had a manifeft connection with the war; of these I shall at different times take proper notice. The only military preparations of great importance in this kingdom were naval. At Portfmouth, Plymouth, Chatham, &c. feveral armaments were getting ready with great diligence. A fquadron of eleven thips of the line, and nine frigates, had been fome time in the Mediterranean, under the command of admiral Ofborn, to block up M. de la Clue, who was in Carthagena, with a french squadron. On the 28th of april, Mr. Ofborn fell in with another fmall fquadron of french ships, in their way from Toulon, to rein-force de la Clue's squadron, commanded by M. de Quesne, in the Foudroyant of 80 guns, the Orpheus of 64, the Oriflamme of 50, and the Pleiade of 24. While the chief part of the english squadron continued off Carthagena, to watch the french ships there, capt. Storr, in the Revenge of 64 guns, supported by capt. Hughes, in the Berwick of 63, and capt. Evans, Q +in.

in the Prefton of 50, took the Orpheus, commanded by M: de Herville with 500 men; capt. Gardiner, in the Monmouth of 64, fupported by capt. Stanhope, in the Swiftsure of 70, and captain Hervey, in the Hampton-court of 64, took the Foudroyant with 800 men. Capt. Rowley, in the Montague of 60, and capt. Montague, in the Monarch of 74, ran the Ori-flamme on fhore, under the caftle of Aiglos; but was not deftroyed by reafon of the neutrality of the coaft of Spain. The Pleiade got away by out-failing the englifh fhips. The greateft lofs fuftained by the victors, was in that of the brave capt. Gardiner; lieutenant Carket commanded his ship on the captain's death, and fought the Foudroyant, with great con-duct and courage; as a reward for which, admiral Ofborn conferred on him the command of the ship he had conquered, and M. de Quesne, when he ftruck, refused to give his fword to capt. Stanhope ; but gave it with great politeness to lieutenant Carket. The fleet in Carthagena confifted of one ship of 84 guns, three of 74, two of 64, two of 50, one of 36, one of 24, one of 16, and one of 14.

The english cruifing squadrons, in the beginning of this year, were very fuccessful in taking a great number of french merchantmen and privateers. We had one under vice-admiral Smith in the Downs, another under rear-admiral Cotes, in the Weft-Indies, who had done the english trade in those parts great fervice, by his conduct and bravery. Another ftrong Iquadron, under admiral Boscawen, failed from Spithead, for north America, the 19th of february. The 12th of march, fir Edward Hawke failed with feven fhips of the line, and three frigates, from Spithead, to cruife in the bay of Bifcay; the 4th of april he fell in, off the isle of Aix, with a french fquadron, of five fhips of the line, feven frigates, and a convoy of 40 merchantmen, to which he gave chace; the men of war fled, and the merchantmen, many of them them were ran on fhore out of the reach of the englifh fhips, and only two or three taken. On the 7th of april, the Effex of 64 guns, and two frigates, in their way to join fir Edward Hawke, fell in with 12 fail more of french merchant's fhips, efcorted by a frigate of 22 guns, which the Effex took, together with five or fix of the merchantmen.

In the beginning of march, a fmall fquadron, confifting of the Naffau of 64 guns, the Harwich of 50, the Rye of 24, a floop and two buffes, under the command of captain Marsh (having on board a body of marines, under major Malon, and a detachment of artillery, under captain Walker) failed from Plymouth for the coast of Africa. On the 24th of april, this fquadron arrived off the river Senegall, got over the bar the 29th; and the next day landed 700 marines and feamen, with defign to attack the french fort Lewis; but deputies arrived with articles on which they proposed to furrender, and these being agreed to, the english forces were put in possession of this most important settlement; where they found 232 french officers and foldiers, 92 pieces of cannon; with treasure, flaves, and merchandize to a very confiderable value. The fuccess which this small force met with, was of the greatest importance to the englifh nation, and of equal prejudice to the french : I shall speak more fully of it hereafter *.

The Eaft-Indies, fince the beginning of the war, had been a theatre fruitful in events. The year 1758, in that country, was diffinguished by many acts of importance. Vice-admiral Pocock, fince the death of Mr. Watfon, had commanded in chief there. Being joined by commodore Stevens in Madrafs road, on the 24th of march, with reinforcements from England, he put to fea with his fquadron * the 27th, with defign to intercept a french fquadron in those parts, under the command of M. d'Ache. The 20th he came in fight of them; the french admiral (whofe fquadron confifted of three ships of 74 guns, two of 64, two of 60, two of 50, and one of 36) on feeing Mr. Pocock's fleet, formed his line, as did the english admiral, and bore down on the enemy; the engagement lasted but a very short time, before M. d'Ache broke his line, and bore away; when Pocock hung out the fignal for a general chace; but night coming on, he continued the purfuit without any ef-The first of may, he came to an anchor near fect. Madrafs, and was informed, that one of the french thips of 74 guns, was fo much damaged in the action, that its captain had ran her on fhore. This victory would have been much more complete, had the captains who commanded in the rear of the english fquadron, done their duty; for when the admiral threw out the fignal for a clofe engagement, they kept back, and would not bear down, even after repeated fignals had been made. rifon, with the reft of the officers and men on board the Yarmouth. The admiral, on his arrival at Madrafs, ordered a court martial to affemble, to enquire into the conduct of those captains, whose behaviour had appeared so faulty. In consequence of which, capt. Nicholas Vincent was sentenced to be difmissed from the command of the Weymouth: capt. George Legge of the Newcastle, to be cashiered from his majesty's fervice; and capt. William Brereton to loose one year's rank, as a post captain.

The officers of the fhip treated him with great civility, with which he feemed vastly pleased. At parting, he told the captain, he should be extremely fond of feeing the king of England, which he thought he might do, as he had ships at his command, for if he had thips, he would go and fee him.

Mr. Pocock having repaired the most material damages his fquadron had received, put to fea the 10th of may, with an intent to get up to fort St. David's, but was not able to effect it; he fuspected the french defigned to attack it, and knew, that if his fquadron was there, fuch an attempt would be impracticable. His fufpicions were but too true; the french army under M. Lally, had befieged it, with the affiftance of fome of the french ships, and it furrendered the 2d of june. The 30th of may, Mr. Pocock was in fight of Pondicherry; and fome days after hearing that fort St. David's was taken, he returned immediately to Madrafs. He put to fea again, the 25th of july, in quest of the enemy, and on the 3d of august, by taking advantage of a sea breeze, he got the weather gage, and brought on an engagement. In ten minutes M. d'Ache bore away, keeping a very irregular line, and continuing a running fire till three o'clock, when the english admiral made the fignal for a general chace; and purfued them till it was dark, when they escaped by out-failing him, and got into Pondicherry road; where they continued till the 3d of feptember, when they failed for their iflands to clean and refit; two of their ships being in a very bad condition, and others confiderably damaged.

M. Lally, as foon as had taken fort St. David's, marched with 2500 men, into the king of Tanjour's country, to try, if poffible, to procure a fum of money from him; being refused, he plundered a trading town on the coast, and besieged his capital, but meeting with a more refolute defence than he expected, he retreated about the middle of august, in great confusion, to Carrical, a french sea-port settlement; and from thence to Pondicherry, at the end of fep-tember. About the middle of december, the french army again moved from their quarters, and marched to lay fiege to Madrafs : colonels Lawrence and Draper commanded there, and fustained all the attacks of the french, with the greatest conduct and bravery, making several successful fallies : but a reinforcement arriving in the port the middle of february, 1759, the enemy raifed the fiege, and retreated with the ut-most precipitation, leaving behind them feveral batteries of cannon and mortars; having fuffered very feverely during the fiege. General Lally was efteemed an officer of abilities, he had ferved many times with reputation in Europe; and was of greater rank than the french court usually fend into this country. The bad fuccefs he met with was entirely owing to the miferable troops he commanded, and the want of the neceffary fupport from Europe. The want of a firmnefs in the administration of the government of France at home, occafioned that manifest weaknefs which fo evidently appeared in all her colonies. There were feveral other expeditions undertaken on both fides, in the beginning of 1759; but I fhall give an account of them hereafter. The chain of affairs in India, during the year 1758, was fo connected, that I could not avoid giving a hiftory of the whole year at once. It will also appear more perfpicuous to the reader.

The continent of Europe at this time, bid more fair for being the theatre of great events. Half Europe, as I before mentioned, was employed in making preparations for the enfuing campaign. The french were very diligent in putting their army on the the Rhine, on a better footing. It will not here be amils to take a flight view of the court of France; for then the caufe of the defpicable figure, which the french army in Hanover made, the latter end of the laft campaign, will more clearly appear.

Madam de Pompadour, mistress to the king of France, had governed that monarch and his kingdom for 15 years, with the most absolute sway. A quarrel between her and the marshaless d'Estrees was the occafion of recalling the marshal, indisputably one of the greatest generals in France, from his command in Hanover. The duke de Richelieu, who fucceeded him, bought his promotion by an immense bribe to her. This woman fet every thing, in the gift of the crown, up to fale; commiffions in the army and the navy, were at her difpofal. Little artifices, and petty paffions could never make great minifters. Yet, fhe afpired ftill higher, and affumed all the au-thority of a defpotic miftrefs, that gave what motion fhe pleafed to the state machine. Mean spirited councils naturally enough coming from her, and not the lefs followed for their being fo; minifters difgraced, generals recalled, and appointed at her im-perious nod, and all of these for the worft, fignalized her power and her want of judgment. In the mean time, this subversion of all order and dignity threw a general languor into the administration of affairs. The fubjects of the greatest rank, merit, and abili-ties, were either driven into corners, or voluntarily fhrank from the indignity of places, that could only be held on the fcandalous terms of paying court to a woman, conftantly jealous of not having enough of that refpect flewn her, to which fle muft have been confcious of having fo little title, and but the more intent on hiding that meannefs of her's, by an infoluence for each terms and surge for the terms. infolence fo much fitter to prove and expose it. The confequence of this must be, the filling the places, thus vacant, with petty characters ; whole greatest merit merit could only be the having none, as no merit could there exift, but what muft be incompatible with a fubmiffion to her, or with fubminiftering to the will and measures of a woman, that vifibly facrificed to her own private paffions, the king who was governed, and the kingdom that was difhonoured by her*. Under fuch an adminiftration, could it be wondered at, that France made fo pitiful a figure in the war fhe carried on. But the neceffity of the times called loudly for a change of minifters and measures, and indeed the court found themfelves obliged to make fome alterations in their conduct. The duke de Bellisse, whose abilities and conduct had gained him fo great a character, was placed at the head of the military department +; in which he endea-

† On the duke's taking his place in council, as fecretary of war, he made the following fenfible and animated fpeech; which as it fets the bad flate of the french army in a very clear light, I fhall infert it here:

" I know, faid he, the flate of our armies. It gives me great grief, and no lefs indignation : for befides the real evil of the diforder in itself, the difgrace and infamy which it reflects on our government, and on the whole nation, is still more to be apprehended. The choice of officers ought to be made with mature deliberation. I know but too well, to what length the want of discipline, pillaging, and robbing have been carried on, by the officers and common men, after the example fet them by their generals. It mortifies me to think I am a frenchman; my principles are known to be very different from those which are now followed. I had the fatisfaction to retain the effeem, the friendship, and the confideration of all the princes, noblemen, and even of all the common people, in all parts of Germany, where I commanded the king's forces. They lived there in the midft of abundance; every one was pleafed; it fills my foul with anguish, to find, that at prefent, the french are held in execration; that every body is difpirited, and that many officers publicly fay things that are criminal, and highly punishable. The evil is fo great, that it demands immediate redrefs. I can eafily judge by what paffes in my own breaft, of what our generals feel from the fpeeches they must daily hear in Germany, concerning our conduct; which indeed would lofe much to be compared endeavoured to make a thorough reformation. The involving the french nation in a german war, was a meafure against which this minister had before given his advice: but as it had been embraced, and his country was engaged too far to recede, he refolved to put the army in Germany on a good footing, and to profecute the war with vigour.

Indeed the ftate of France, at this time, was truly deplorable; the great effort which it was refolved to make in Germany, drew off the attention of the miniftry from their marine, and confequently from the due protection of their trade. The royal navy ran to ruin, and the trade of France, the finews of their power, was cut off by the englifh fhipping; in this condition, it was impoffible to fupport the war vigoroufly in America, and the Eaft-Indies; nay, it was afterwards found, that even the very coaft of France was far from being impenetrable.

compared with that of our allies. I muft particularly complain of the delays and irregularity of the pofts; a fervice which is very ill provided for. I am likewife difpleafed at the negligence of our generals, in returning anfwers; which is a manifeft breach of their duty. Had I commanded the army, a thoufand things which are done, would not have been done, and others which are neglected, would have been executed. I would have multiplied my communications; I would have fitrong pofts on the right, on the left, and in the center, lined with troops. I would have had magazines in every place. The quiet and fatisfaction of the country fhould have been equal to their prefent difaffection, at being harraffed and plundered; and we fhould have been as much beloved, as we are at prefent abhorred. The confequences are too apparent to need being mentioned. I muft infift on thefe things, becaufe late redrefs is better than the continuation of the evil."

This fpeech is a fenfible and juft one. But how can we reconcile the exprefions of humanity and tendernefs for the conquered, and other countries in Germany, which it contains, with thofe we meet with in the marfhal duke's letters, found among the papers of marfhal Contades, at the battle of Minden ?—It is in his letters we are to look for his real fentiments, not in his fpeeches. (256)

The ministry in England refolved to strengthen their alliance with Pruffia, https://with his pruffian majefty. Finding that he see affer ment between the courts of Verfame and Conne Was eve ry day growing more firm, they all, regarded the fafety of that monarch, as neceffary to preferve the ballance of power in Europe. Purluant to this plan, a fecond convention was figned the 11th of april, between the kings of Great Britain and Pruffia, by which it was agreed, that the king of Great Britain should pay, on demand, to his pruffian majefty 4,000000 german crowns, (670,000 l. fterling :) which fum, that monarch engaged to employ in augmenting his forces, that were to act for the good of the common caufe. The two kings alfo agreed, not to conclude any treaty of peace, truce, or neutrality, &c. with the powers at war, but in concert, and in mutual agreement, wherein, both fhould be by name comprehended. On the 20th, the commons voted that fum for his majefty's fervice.

I left prince Ferdinand of Brunfwick with the hanoverian army under his command, juft retired into winter quarters, without meeting with any interruption from the french, having gained feveral advantages over them. Count Clermont now commanded the french army, the third commander in chief it had obeyed within a year *. Prince Ferdinand divided his troops into two bodies, the principal one under himfelf, marched on the right, to the country of Bremen, whilft a fecond body, under general Zaftrow, kept on towards Gifforn. The prince made

* It was faid, that foon after his arrival at Hanover, he wrote to his mafter, that he had found his majefty's army divided into three bodies, one above ground, the other under ground, and the third in the hofpitals. Therefore he defired his majefty's inftructions, whether he fhould endeavour to bring the first away, or if he should flay till it had joined the other two.

himfelf master of Rottenburg, Ottersberg, Verden, and Bremen, by the middle of february, with little or no opposition; during his stay at the latter place, being informed, that the french general, the count de Chabot, with a strong detachment, was posted at Hoya, upon the Wefer, a post of such importance, that the prince refolved to dislodge him. He pitched upon the hereditary prince of Brunswick, his nephew, to execute that fervice, with four battalions, and some light horfe. The young prince, not 20 years of age, full of ardour to diftinguish himself, took the command of those troops, and in executing his uncle's orders, displayed to much conduct and bravery, as would have done honour to the maturity of the. most experienced general.

Before he came to Hoya, there was a deep and broad river to pass, without any means of croffing it, but a fmall float of timber, and two or three fmall boats, which carried about eight men each. One battalion of foot, and a squadron of dragoons were deftined to make a feint attack on the left side of the Wefer : the three other battalions were to pass the river, and enter the back part of the town. The paffing the river on a fingle float took up fo much time, that a long while was fpent in getting lefs than half the corps over; by the time the first half was over, a high wind arofe, which rendered the float unferviceable, and feparated the prince from the greater part of his men, when the enemy he was going to attack, were more numerous than his whole party were they joined. In this dilemma, (out of which nothing but the fpirit and genius of the prince could have extricated him) he took a refolution worthy of Cæfar himfelf; he refolved not to fpend any more time, in endeavours to get over more men, but to march brifkly on against the enemy, in fo bold a manner as to poffefs them with an opinion of his ftrength, and attack them before they could unde-S ceive themfelves. Between four and five o'clock in the morning, he marched directly against Hoya, with a regiment of horfe, part of a battalion, and a hautbitzer. When they got upon the caufeway, within a mile and a half of the town, an unluckly accident happened, which might have ruined the whole enterprife, the detachment fired upon four of the enemy's dragoons that were patrolling. This firing was caught from one to another, and at last became general. This was more than fufficient to have difcovered them ; but putting on a bold countenance, they continued their march with the greateft diligence, and met with no obstruction, till they came to the bridge of the town, where a very finart fire well fupported enfued; but the ground before the gate not being large enough for the prince to bring up all his men, he judiciously formed the refolution to turn the enemy, by attacking them in the rear; to execute which, he went a circuit round the town, with part of his men, attacked the enemy with bayonet fixed, and having drove them out of the town, with a great flaughter, re-joined his other party. Chabot threw himfelf into the caftle, making a fhew of defence, but furrendered the place, with his flores and magazines; his troops being permitted to march out, as the prince had no heavy cannon to lay a regular fiege to it. This piece of fervice was executed the 23d of february.

Prince Ferdinand continued to advance; and the french every where to retreat. The 5th of march he laid clofe fiege to Minden, the only place which the french poffeffed in the electorate of Hanover: and it furrendered with its garrifon of 4000 men prifoners of war, the 14th. The hanoverian army was every where fuccefsful; the miferable condition of the french is not to be defcribed; the total neglect of military difcipline, the want of cloaths in fuch a rigorous feafon: the lofs of all their baggage, and even their provisions, by the hanoverian hunters, who were cotinually ally harraffing them : this concatination of misfortunes had fo reduced their numbers, that the poor wretched foldiers were really to be pitied, had not they, by their barbarities, inflicted the fame mifery on the inhabitants of the country which they had evacuated. But one exception we must make to this behaviour; the duke de Randan left Hanover with all the generofity and virtue with which he had go-verned it. Every where elfe, the french generals burnt all the magazines they could not carry off; but this amiable nobleman, although he had time to do the fame, left them all in the hands of the magistrates, to be gratuitously distributed amongst the poor; he employed all his vigilence to prevent his foldiers plundering, or using any violence to the in-habitants, and was himself the last man that marched out of the city. For this humane and generous behaviour, prince Ferdinand and the regency of Hanover, fent him letters of thanks; and the clergy in their fermons, did not fail to celebrate the action. In short, the duke's conduct, which did fuch honour to his name, and country, has made his memory for ever dear to the hanoverians, and drew tears of love and gratitude from his very enemies; which furely must give that general a much more durable fatisfaction, than any he could have had from following the example of his countrymen, in fatiating a brutal revenge.

After the reduction of Minden, the french army retired to Hamelen; but on the approach of the hanoverians, evacuated it, leaving their magazines and their fick behind them, not ftopping till they came to Paderborn, where they fixed their head quarters the 18th of march. But the combined army arriving the next day at Melle, the french retreated as faft as they could towards the Rhine, and in their march were joined by the troops that had been at Embden, and at Caffel, and in the land-S 2 graviate graviate of Heffe, which they evacuated the 21ft. During their whole march they were clofely purfued by the pruffian huffars, and the hanoverian hunters, who killed and made prifoners numbers of their men. At laft this once formidale army paffed the Rhine, only leaving on the other fide of it a ftrong garrifon in Wefel, where the prince of Clermont fixed his head quarters.

A conftant train of fuccels at this time attended the hanoverian arms; and every where throughout the whole circle of Weftphalia, the french met with the feverest rebuffs. Embden was in the middle of march recovered by commodore Holmes, with a fmall fquadron of men of war. The french garrifon of 4000 men, as foon as they difcovered the commodore's fleet, evacuated the place. As foon as Mr. Holmes perceived their defign, he fent his armed boats to purfue them, they took too or three of the enemy's veffels; and in one of them was found the fon of an officer of diffinction, and a large fum of money. Mr. Holmes immediately reftored the youth to his father, and offered to return the money, upon receiving the officer's word of honour, that it was his private property; a conduct which does honour to the commodore. But we must leave the operations of the armies on the Rhine, for the prefent, and take a view of the measures which his pruffian majefty took to diftress his enemies the austrians.

That monarch opened the campaign with the fiege of Schweidnitz, which had been blocked up all the winter; and after 13 days fiege, it furrendered the 16th of april, with its garrifon, (which at the begining of the blockade was 7000 men, but reduced by ficknefs, &c. to 3000) prifoners of war. By the taking of this important poft, the king of Pruffia cleared all Silefia of the auftrians. His majefty himfelf, in the mean time, marched with a part of his army towards Gruffian and Friedland, and fent a detachment detachment as far as Trantenau, in Bohemia, where was an auftrian garrifon, which after a warm refiftance, was obliged to abandon the place, and fall back to their grand army at Konigfgratz, where it had been pofted fince the arrival of marfhal Daun, who fet out from Vienna the 9th of march. By this the pruffians opened themfelves a way into Bohemia, where they immediately poured in detachments of light troops, to raife contributions, and to harrafs the out-pofts of the enemy. At the fame time, general Fouquet, at the head of another detachment, marched againft the auftrian general Jahnus, who was pofted in the county of Glatz, and obliged him to abandon the pofts he had occupied in that county.

Befides the grand army in Silefia, his majefty formed another under his brother prince Henry, of above 30,000 men, in Saxony, to oppole the army of the empire, which by means of the immenfe diligence that was ufed in collecting the troops, and by joining a body of auftrians, was again in a condition to act. Count Dohna commanded another on the fide of Pomerania; and a confiderable body was posted between Wolau and Glogau, to cover Silefia from any inroads which the ruffians might make into it. All thefe armies were posted in fuch a masterly manner, as to keep open a communication with one another ; and were admirably situated for their defined purposes.

But the king of Pruffia's defign was very different from what the auftrians imagined; he had placed his army in fuch a polition, that his enemies thought he would open the campaign, by marching into Bohemia. That monarch's feint took; whilft the auftrians were preparing to oppofe his march, he fuddenly made a rapid march towards Moravia, which country he entered the 3d of may. He had fome time before collected his army, amounting to about 50,000 men, near Neifs in Silefia, and marched in three days to Troppau, he divided it into two columns; marshal Keith at the head of the first column, fet out the 25th of april, and took the road to Jagerndorf; and the king himfelf with the fecond, on the 27th. Thefe two bodies entered the plain of Olmutz, one by Sternherg, and the other by Gibau. General de la Ville, who commanded a body of auftrian troops in Moravia, retired on the approach of the pruffians, who advanced by fwift and rapid marches; de Ville threw part of his corps into Olmutz. The king had left general Fouquet in the county of Glatz, to watch the motions of marfhal Daun; but finding that the auftrians were beginning their march for Moravia, this general went to Neifs, and took under his convoy the artillery and ftores that were requilite for belieging Olmutz, and arrived at Gibau on the 12th of may : the king advanced that day as far as Ollfchau, and drove away a body of auftrians, who retired from thence to Profinitz, near which place the prince of Wurtemburg fixed his camp of four regiments of dragoons, one of huffars, and fome battalions of fuzileers. The king opened the trenches against Olmutz, the 27th.

In the mean time, marshal Daun left his camp at Konigfgratz, and advanced by Skalitz, near Nachod in Bohemia, to Leutomysfel, where he encamped; but quitted it the 23d, entering Moravia by Billa, and marched to Gewicz: general Harsch commanded his vanguard, and pitched his camp at Allerheiligen opposite to Littau; and 5 or 6000 more of them advanced to Prostnitz. This fituation of the austrian army did honour to marshal Daun. The country from Gewicz to Littau, in which he took his poss, was so mountainous, that it was impossible to attack him. He had the fertile country of Bohemia, from which he easily and readily drew supplies, in his back. He was also from this position enabled to harrafs the prussian army before Olmutz, and to intercept the convoys convoys which were brought to them from Silefia. His pruffian majefty found a great difficulty in the fiege, from the extent of the works round the city : for this obliged him to have his pofts in many places very weak. Marshal Daun made the most of this advantage. In the night of the 8th of june, he attacked one of the pruffian pofts, penetrated through the camp, and threw fuccours into the city, whole garrifon at the beginning of the fiege confifted of 6000 men, under general Marshal. This advantage encouraged the austrians, so that scarce a night passed without fome fuch attacks. Another circumstance which retarded the king's operations very much, was the want of forage; the auftrians had deftroyed all there was in the king's rout to Olmutz, fo that his horfe was obliged to forage at a confiderable diftance : which harraffed them extremely. The king of Pruffia endeavoured by every art in his power to provoke Daun to a battle; but that able general knew too well the advantage of the game he was playing, to throw it out of his hands.

The marshal being informed that a great prussian convoy was to leave Troppau the 25th of june, refolved by attacking it to endeavour to force the pruffians to raife the fiege. The forces who efcorted this convoy, confifted of eight battalions, and near 4000 recovered fick. Daun detached general Jahnus, who was at Muglitz, towards Bahrn, and ordered a detachment to march from Prerau to Stadt-Liebe, that the convoy might be attacked on two fides; and in order to deceive the pruffian army, he drew near to them, very near Predlitz. But the king was too experienced a general to be deceived ; he fent out general Zeithen with a ftrong corps to meet it. The convoy was attached on the 28th, before that general could come up with it; but the enemy were repulfed, and routed. Marshal Daun having reinforced his detachments, the convoy was again attacked, on S 4 the 29th, between Bantsch and Dornstadt. Part of it had scarce pass the defiles of Dornstadt, when the austrians fell upon it with their whole force. The head of the convoy was cut off from the reft: and though general Zeithen did on this occasion, all that could be expected from the most experienced officer, yet he was obliged to abandon his waggons, and retire to Troppau. Only the head of the convoy arrived in the prussian camp, the rest was taken by the enemy. This was a fatal stroke; for had it arrived fase, the place would not have held out above a fortnight longer.

The king of Pruffia directly found himfelf under the neceffity of raifing the fiege : and this neceffity was augmented, by the news which he every day received, of the near approach of the ruffian army to his dominions. Marshal Daun had made an excellent movement, whereby he advanced himfelf to Pofnitz, in fuch an advantageous fituation, that he was able to fupport Olmutz in the most effectual manner. But by this movement, he left the frontiers of Bohemia uncovered. The king of Prussia in an instant faw this advantage, and refolved to make his retreat into Bohemia: had he fallen back into Silefia, he wifely forefaw, that he fhould draw the whole auftrian army into his own dominions. To deceive marshal Daun, he kept up an exceeding brifk fire the day before the fiege was raifed : but in the night of july 1, the king and his whole army took the road to Bohemia, and gained an entire march upon the enemy, fo that for all the utmost efforts which they made to overtake him, he entered Bohemia without any loss. Marshal Keith marched by Littau to Muglitz and Tribau; the king's column marched by Konitz. The vanguard, under the prince of Anhalt Deffau, feized at Leutomiffel, a confiderable magazine. Marshal Daun de-tached a large body of troops, under the generals Buccow, and Laudohn, to harrafs the king's march; but but they did not incommode him in the leaft. The pruffian army proceeded by Zwittau to Leutomiffel, where it halted a day, and from thence to Hohemauth. Marshal Keith dispersed a body of austrians at Holliz, while the king marched by Leutomiffel, and arrived the 11th at Konigfgratz, where general Buccow was with 7000 men, who were posted behind the Elbe, and in the intrenchments they had thrown up all round the city; but he retired in a few days with his little army towards Clumetz ; upon which his pruffian majefty immediately took poffeffion of that important poft, and laid all the neighbouring country under contribution : but as provisions grew very scarce, and his prefence was wanted more and more in his own dominions, he fent lieut. general Fouquet with 16 battalions and 15 fquadrons, to occupy the post of Nachod : the king himfelf marched to Oppotfchna; and marshal Daun's army was encamped the 22d of july, on the hills of Libifchaw. As the king had refolved to retire into Silefia, he left the camp of Konigfgratz, the 25th, and having passed the Mettau the 28th, encamped at Jaffina; from whence he difpatched general Retzow, towards the hills of Studnitz, from whence he drove the auftrian general Jahnus. His pruffian majefty directed his courfe through the county of Glatz, and towards the northern part of Silefia; he arrived the first of august at Skalitz, and after a rapid march of 21 days, by Wisoca, Politz, and Landshut, encamped the 22d at Frankfort on the Oder ; where we must leave him for the prefent, to take a view of the military operations between Great Britain and France.

THE ministry in England were divided in their opinions, as to the manner in which it was best to profecute the war against France. Some were for making the great push in Germany, and improving to the utmost those advantages which prince Ferdinand had already gained. Others were alfo for fending fome english troops thither; but not for making it the principal theatre of our military operations, they thought that our great navy might be employed to advantage, in convoying an army over to the coast of France, and affifting it in the attempts it should make. The latter opinion prevailed, and in confequence of it, a ftrong fquadron of fhips being prepared at Spithead, with a fuffi-cient number of transports, orders were isfued for affembling a body of troops on the ifle of Wight; and in the beginning of may, all the corps that composed this body were in motion. A battering train of artillery, and all the ordnance proper for fuch an armament, had already been embarked at the the tower, and conveyed to Portfmouth in 9 transports. On the 16th, the army, confifting of fixteen batta-lions, and three companies of artillery, was formed on the ifle of Wight; but nine troops of light horfe defigned for this ENTERPRIZE, were left on the Portfinouth fide, for the convenience of eafier embarkation. The duke of Marlborough was commander in chief; lord George Sackville was fecond in command, and under these was another lieutenant general, befides five major generals *. Lord Anfon and fir Edward Hawke commanded the grand fleet; and commodore Howe a smaller, who was entrusted with every thing that related to landing the troops in the enemy's dominions : for this purpose, a confiderable number of flat-bottomed boats, of a new invention were provided, and nothing was wanting that could be deemed neceffary to forward the execution of the enterprife. Lord Downe, fir James Lowther, fir John Armitage, Mr. Berkeley, and Mr. Delaval, perfons of diffinction, rank and fortune, engaged as volunteers in the fervice. And the whole nation formed the most ardent hopes of fuccefs in it.

wards the bay of Bifcay, with defign to fpread the alarm down the whole coast of France; and to watch the motions of the fquadron in Breft harbour. The fleet under commodore Howe, with the transports, having on board the troops, amounting, as I faid be-fore, to fixteen battalions, and nine troops of light horfe, was deftined for the bay of Cancalle, in the neighbourhood of St. Maloe's, where they landed on the 5th, and directly feized the posts and villages, and the next day marked out a piece of ground for a camp, in order to fecure their retreat. The common foldiers and feamen plundered every thing that came in their way, and even murdered many of the old inhabitants in the villages, to the reproach of difcipline, and difgrace of humanity. The difem-barkation being finished; on the 7th, the duke of Marlborough, and lord George Sackville, with the first column of the army, began their march towards St. Maloe's: lord Ancram with the fecond column, advanced towards the fame place, by the village of Doll. The next day and night a detachment of the army burnt above 100 fail of fhipping, many of them privateers, from 20 to 30 guns, together with a great number of magazines, filled with naval ftores, at St. Servan and Solidore, a fauxbourg to St. Maloe's, with a large and open harbour. The troops alfo took poffeffion of a fort which the enemy had abandoned. During these transactions, there was a brigade left in the intrenchment at Cancalle, who continued to ftrengthen it, which was very eafily done, for there never was a finer fituation for a fmall army to make a ftand againft any fuperior number. In the mean time, the light horfe and out parties fcoured the country, and brought in a confiderable number of prifoners; but the town of St. Maloe's was too ftrong for them to attempt taking it. The 10th, the troops marched back to the landing place at Cancalle, and encamped within the intrenchments and redubts juft finished; finished; and they were re-embarked the 11th. The next day the town of Granville was reconnoitred, by a gentleman who had been formerly in that place. He perceived a camp before it, and received intelligence, that there was a confiderable body of troops there under the marshal de Harcourt, commander of the french troops in Normandy. The 28th, they directed their course to Cherbourg, the bay of which is open to the fea, without affording any fecurity to fhipping. Here it was refolved to land, and a difpofition was made accordingly. The generals determined, that the forts Querqueville, Hommet, and Gallet, should be attacked in the night, by the first regiment of guards. The men were actually diftributed in the flat bottomed boats, when a very high wind arofe, and obliged them to postpone the attack; and the weather continuing to be unfavourable, it was judged proper to put to fea immediately; accordingly the fleet sailed towards the isle of Wight, and anchored at St. Helen's the 1st of july. The duke of Marlborough and lord George Sackville set out for London, where the king received them very gracioufly, leaving the command of the troops to the earl of Ancram. The 5th, orders came to difembark the troops, till the transports should be revictualled. They accordingly landed at Cowes, and marched into their old intrenchments.

Such was the refult of this expedition to the coaft of France. Concerning the fuccefs of it, we fhould obferve, that the defign which the englifh miniftry had in making the attempt was, to deftroy the enemy's fhipping and naval flores, to fecure the navigation of the englifh channel; and to alarm the king of France in fuch a manner, as would oblige him to employ a great number of troops for the defence of his own coaft; to hamper him in the profecution of his defigns upon Germany, and to fcreen Great Britain and Ireland from the danger of any invafion or infult. It fhould fhould alfo be remembered, that the fuccefs which attended the expedition, was obtained with little or no lofs. But whether we may reafonably pronounce, that the good refulting from the expedition, paid for the expence we were at in forming and executing it, is a point I will not pretend to decide. Indeed the french king, while an englifh fquadron of fhips, and a ftrong body of troops were employed in attacking the maritime parts of France, could not fend fuch powerful reinforcements to his armies in Germany, as if his own dominions were entirely free from fuch infult. Befides, this fuccefs convinced all Europe of the real fuperiority of the englifh naval power, which attacked the coafts of France, while other fquadrons blocked up their fhips in their own harbours.

In America it was reafonable to expect better fuccefs than our arms had hitherto met with, for the force which was employed was very formidable. Three grand expeditions were undertaken ; one againft Louisburg, another against Ticonderoga and Crown Point, and the third against fort du Quesne. General Abercrombie fucceeded lord Loudon in the chief command, his lordfhip being recalled in the winter; and he refolved to command the expedition against Ticonderoga, himself. Having collected the troops together, he embarked them to the number of 6000 regulars, and 9000 provincials, with a good train of artillery, in 900 batteaus and 150 whale boats on the lake George, the 5th of july; and landed at the deftined place the 6th; the general formed his troops into four columns, and marched againft Ticonderoga. The enemy's advanced guard fled on his approach, deferting a logged camp, after burning their tents, &c. The country was all a wood, through which the english army continued their march; but found it impaffible with any regularity for fuch a body of men, and the guides were unskilful, the troops were bewildered, and the columns columns broke, falling in upon one another. Lord Howe, at the head of the right center column, being fomewhat advanced, fell in with a party of french regulars, of about 400 men, who had likewife loft themfelves in their retreat, from their advanced guard : a fkirmifh enfued, in which the french party were defeated, with fome lofs. This advantage coft the engglifh very dear, their lofs was inconfiderable in numbers, but great in confequence. The gallant lord Howe was the firft man that fell. This brave young nobleman was an honour to his country : his genius, courage and judgment difplayed themfelves in all his actions. His regiment was one of the beft in America, owing entirely to the care which his lordfhip took of their difcipline; and his inftructing them particularly in the nature of the fervice, in that woody country. His death fpread the greateft grief and confternation throughout the whole army, as he was defervedly and univerfally beloved and refpected in it. Commodore Howe fucceeded him in his title and in his virtues *.

General Abercrombie had taken feveral prifoners, who were unanimous in their reports, that the french had about 6000 men encamped before their fort at Ticonderoga, who were intrenching themfelves, and

* There is fomething fo noble and pathetic in the following advertifement, that any apology for inferting it is needlefs. It appeared in the public papers foon after lord Howe's death.

"To the gentlemen, clergy, freeholders and burgeffes of the town, and county of the town of Nottingham,

As lord Howe is now abfent upon the public fervice, and lieut. colonel Howe is with his regiment at Louisburg, it refts upon me to beg the favour of your votes and interefts, that lieut. colonel Howe may supply the place of his late brother, as your representative in parliament.

Permit me therefore, to implore the protection of every one of you, as the mother of him, whole life has been loft in the fervice of his country.

throwing

throwing up a breaft-work; and that they expected a reinforcement of 3000 canadians, befides indians: on this intelligence, he thought it most adviseable to lose no time, but attack them directly. Accordingly, on the 8th, he fent Mr. Clerk the engineer, a-crofs the river, opposite to the fort, in order to reconnoitre the enemy's intrenchments; on his return, he reported, that an attack was practicable, if made before the intrenchments, &c. were finished : the general then determined to ftorm it that very day, without waiting for the artillery, which was not yet come up. The rangers, light infantry, and the right wing of the provincials, were posted in a line out of cannon shot of the intrenchments, in order that the regular troops deftined for the attack of the intrenchments might form in their rear. The picquets were to begin the attack, fustained by the grenadiers, and they by the battalions: the whole were ordered to march up brifkly, rush upon the enemy's fire, and not to give their's till they were within the enemy's breaft work.

These orders being iffued, the whole army, except those left at the landing place, for the defence of the batteaus, &c. were put into motion, and advanced against the fort, which the french had made as strong as possible. It is situated on a tongue of land between lake George, and a narrow gut, which communicates with the lake Champlain. On three fides, it is furrounded with water, and for a good part of the fourth, it has a dangerous morals in the front; where that failed, the french had made a very ftrong line near eight feet high, defended by cannon, and fecured by 4 or 5000 men. They had also felled a great many trees for about an hundred yards, with their branches outward. Such was the post which the engineer had reported to be fo weak, that it was practicable to attack it without cannon.

The english army advanced boldly towards it. When they came up, they not only perceived, how much much ftronger the enemy's intrenchments were, than they had imagined, but alfo felt it very feverely. The troops behaved with the utmoft fpirit and gallantry; but found themfelves fo entangled amongft the felled trees, and fo uncovered for want of artillery, that they fuffered moft terribly in their approaches; and made fo little impreffion on the intrenchments, that the generals, feeing their reiterated and obftinate efforts fail of fuccefs, and the troops having been upwards of four hours expoled to a moft terrible fire, thought it neceffary to order a retreat, to fave the broken remains of their army. Near 2000 men were killed or wounded in this precipitate and bad conducted attack. General Abercrombie fhewed that he could retreat as faft as he could advance; for after a moft fpeedy flight, the army arrived the 9th at their former camp, to the fouthward of lake George, which was the evening after the action.

In all military expeditions; but particularly those in fuch a country as north America, the greatest caution, prudence, and circumspection, are absolutely necessary in the conducting them. What must that general feel, who accepts employments without abilities to execute them; who receives the public money in his pay, and in return makes a facrifice of the death of thousands of his fellow subjects, by his blunders in the field.

But the moff important enterprize in north America, was the attack on Louifburg; it had been concerted by the miniftry in England very early in the year; the fleet was preparing at Portfmouth fome time, and confifted of 21 fhips of the line, and 20 frigates*. Admiral

Admiral Boicawen was commander in chief by fea, having under him, fir Charles Hardy, rear-admiral, and Philip Durel, efq. commodore. Major general Amherst was commander in chief of the land forces, and under him, brigadier generals Whitmore, Law-rence, and Wolfe. Colonel Baftide, chief engineer, col. Williamfon, commander of the train of artillery. Admiral Boscawen failed from England, with part of the above fleet, the 19th of february, and having joined the north american forces, at Hallifax in Nova Scotia, failed from thence the 28th of may. The land forces aboard the fleet (which confifted of 157 fail) amounted to 14,000 men. The fleet anchored in Gabarus bay, in the island of Cape Breton, the 2d of june. That evening the general, with briga-diers Lawrence and Wolfe, reconnoitered the shore as near as he could, and made a disposition for land-ing in three places. The enemy had made entrenchments along the fhore, mounted with cannon, and lined with a numerous infantry, where-ever there was any likelihood of the english attempting to land. It was the eighth before they could land their troops, the furff on shore had been so great, that no boat could poffibly live. During the intermediate time, the french had been making their entrenchments as ftrong as poffible, they had cannonaded and threw fhells, though ineffectually, at the fhips. But on the 8th, the admiral finding that the furff was fomewhat abated, the troops were affembled in the boats before break of day, in three divisions. The Kennington frigate was stationed on the left, and began the fire upon the enemy, followed by the Grammont, Diana, and Shannon frigates in the center, and the Sutherland and Squirrel upon the right : when this fire had continued about a quarter of an hour, the boats upon the left, rowed into fhore, under the command of brigadier general Wolfe. The division on the right, under the command of brigadier general Whitmore, rowed towards the White Point; as if intending to force a landing there. The center division, under brigadier general Lawrence, made at the fame time a fhew of landing, at the fresh watercove. These two last divisions, which were only intended as feints, drew the enemy's attention to every part, and prevented their troops, posted along the coast, from joining those on the right, where the real landing was to be made.

The enemy, in the mean time, were not idle; as they had for fome time expected fuch a vifit, they were fully prepared to refift it. They had thrown up breaft-works, at every probable place of landing, fortified at proper diffances with cannon; befides an immenfe number of fwivels of an extraordinary calibre, mounted on very ftrong perpendicular flocks of wood driven into the ground: they had alfo prepared for flanking, by erecting redans, mounted with cannon, in the moft advantageous fituations. Nothing of the kind was ever feen perhaps more complete, confidering the number of men employed on them, than thefe fortifications. Befides, all the approaches to the front lines were rendered extremely difficult, by the trees they had laid very thick upon the fhore, T 2 round round all the cove, with their branches lying towards the fea, for the diffance of 20 or 30 yards. Nor could this firatagem be fuspected at any great diffance, as the place had the appearance of one continued green of little fcattered branches of fir : and but very few of the guns on their lines were to be diflinguished out of the reach of their metal; the reft were artificially concealed from view, with spruce branches.

The french acted very wifely, did not throw away a fhot, till the boats were near in fhore, and then unmasking the latent destruction, by the removal of the fpruce branches, they directed the whole fire of their cannon and mufketry upon them. The furff was fo great, that a place could hardly be found to get a boat on shore. But notwithstanding the fire of the enemy, and the violence of the furff, brigadier Wolfe purfued his point, and landed just at their left of the cove, took poft, attacked the enemy, and forced them to retreat. Many boats overfet, feveral broke to pieces, and all the men jumped into the water to get on fhore, among the first of whom was general Wolfe. As foon as the left division was debarked, the center rowed to the left, and landed. After that brigadier Whitmore with the division of the right wing, gained the fhore amidst a continual difcharge of fhot and fhells from the enemy's lines. And laft of all landed the commander in chief, major general Amherft, in the rear, full of the higheft fatisfaction, from feeing the refolution, bravery, and fuccefs of the troops, in furmounting difficulties and defpifing dangers. A noble specimen of the spirit he had to depend on in the remaining part of the enterprize.

The moment the troops were landed, they attacked a ftrong battery near them in flank, with fo much vigor, as foon forced the enemy to abandon it. And they fled on all fides; they were purfued till they got within cannon fhot of the town. In a few days after the the landing was effected, the garrifon took the fea-fonable precaution of fetting fire to the barracks, and deftroying in one general conflagration all their out-buildings; and left nothing ftanding within two miles of the town walls.

General Amherst having traced out a camp, fent brigadier Wolfe with a ftrong detachment, round the north-east harbour, to a point of land; five or fix fhips of the line, and as many frigates, which were in the harbour, could bring all their guns to bear upon the approaches of the english, besides a battery on the island in the harbour, which did the fame : to filence thefe, general Wolfe was detached to the light house point; where, on the 12th, he took possession of all the enemy's pofts, and by his fire, he filenced the enemy's island battery on the 25th; but the ships ftill continued to bear upon him.

It was with infinite difficulty and labour, that a road was made from a proper landing place, for the bringing up the artillery to the camp, when landed. The ruggednefs of the ground was fuch, that it was near a month before it was finished. The 21st of july, one of the ships that had continued firing on general Wolfe's batteries, took fire, and blew up, and the flames communicating to the fails of two others, they were also burnt to the water's edge. This was a fad accident to the enemy, as it was not to be repaired. The fiege, during the first part, went on very flowly; but by the middle of july, the great abilities of the generals Amherft and Wolfe, had got the better of innumerable difficulties, and by a well concerted and continual fire, great part of the town was reduced to afhes. The admiral was also extremely attentive to employ his fhips to the beft advantage, and gave all the affiftance in his power on every occasion, to the land forces : he had the 24th of july acquainted the general, that he intended fending 600 failors in boats, into the harbour, to deftroy, or bring away two french T 3 men men of war, that yet remained. The 25th, he ac-. cordingly fent them in, under the command of the captains Laforey and Balfour; they put off about 12 o'clock at night, and by the advantage of the foggy darknefs, and the inviolable filence of the people, paddled into the harbour of Louisburg unperceived. It had been before concerted, that there should be a prodigious brilk fire kept up from the trenches all night, to draw the enemy's attention from the harbour, which had a good effect. In their feeming fecurity, after the boats had pushed almost as far as the grand battery, lest the ships should be too much alarmed by their oars, they took a fweep from thence towards that part of the harbour, where they knew the ships were, and prefently difcovered them. Each division of the boats was no fooner within fight of the two ships, captain Laforey's of le Prudent, and captain Balfour's of le Bienfaisant, than the centinels hailed them in vain, and began to fire on them; and the two captains ordered their boats to give way along fide their refpective fhips, and to board them immediately. In fhort, the men gave three cheers as they pulled up along the fides, boarded them with the greateft bravery and took them; le Prudent being on ground, they burnt her, and towed off the Bienfaifant in the midft of a moft formidable fire from the mortified enemy. One of the bravest and best concerted attempts that ever was undertaken; and does equal honour to the admiral who planned it, and the captains and common men, who executed it.

The 26th, the admiral came on fhore, and acquainted general Amherft, that he defigned fending fix of his men of war into the harbour the next day, to batter the fortifications on the fea fide. He was but just come on fhore, when Mr. Amherft received a letter from the governor, offering to capitulate, much on the fame terms as were granted to the garrifon rifon of Minorca; but, in anfwer to it, admiral Bofcawen and general Amherft returned the following anfwer:

" In anfwer to the propofal I have juft now had the honour to receive from your excellency, by the fieur Loppinot, I have only to tell your excellency, that it hath been determined by his excellency admiral Bofcawen and me, that his fhips fhall go in tomorrow, to make a general attack upon the town. Your excellency knows very well the fituation of the army and fleet; and as his excellency the admiral, as well as I, is very defirous to prevent the effufion of blood, we give your excellency one hour, after receiving this, to determine, either to capitulate as prifoners of war, or to take upon you all the bad confequences of a defence, againft this fleet and army.

To which letter, the governor returned the following refolution :

"To answer your excellencies in as few words as possible, I shall have the honour to repeat to you, that my resolution is still the same; and that I will suffer the confequences, and suffain the attack you speak off.

Le chevalier de DRUCOUR."

However, M. de Drucour changed his opinion; for as foon as Meffrs. Bofcawen and Amherft's letter was received into Louifburg, M. Prevot, commiffary general, and intendant of the colony, brought him a petition from the traders and inhabitants; which determined him to fend back the officer, who had carried his former letter to make his fubmiffion to the law of force : and accordingly the articles of ca-T 4 pitulation

In this advantageous and glorious manner ended one of the most important enterprizes of the whole war; and with fo trifling a loss on the fide of the english, as about 400 men. The british ministry displayed their judgment in planning this attempt. The genius, conduct, and bravery of the commanders who executed it, was equalled by pothing, but the noble emulation and arduous perfeverance, and the desperate courage of the troops they commanded; in particular, admiral Boscawen, and the generals Amherss and Wolfe, gained immortal honour: the former received the thanks of the house of commons.

The conquest of this valuable island was of the greatest advantage to the north american colonies : Louisburg, by its fituation, was a constant repository for the french privateers, who came out from thence in great numbers, and continually infefted the coafts of the english fettlements. But its importance to Britain in general, is still clearer, it was the only place at which the french could cure, or from whence they could catch their cod, the fifh which is taken in fuch great abundance in those feas. This fifhery has many times been computed to bring France in upwards of 1,000000 l. fterling yearly, befides maintaining near 20,000 feamen in conftant em-This article alone fufficiently fpeaks ployment. its real importance. Louifburg was also the key to their fettlements, on the continent of north America : > America; all the fhips that went from France to Canada touched here; before they ventured into the river St. Laurence; the french foon found how great this part of their lofs proved, it being very eafy for the poffeffors of Cape Breton and Newfoundland to intercept most of the fhips that go from Europe to Canada.

In the mean time general Abercrombie, to repair the misfortune he met with at Ticonderoga, difpatched lieutenant colonel Bradstreet, with 3000 troops to make an attack upon fort Frontenac; a fortrefs which the french had built on lake Ontario. Mr. Bradstreet, after a difficult, but well conducted march to Ofwego, embarked his troops there, and landed them within a mile of fort Frontenac, the 25th of august; the garrifon made little opposition, furrendering prifoners of war the 27th. It was a fquare fort of 100 yards, having 60 cannon, but only half of them were mounted, and 16 fmall mortars. Lieutenant colonel Bradstreet found in it 120 men, befides fome indians, and women and children. There was an immense quantity of provisions and goods, defigned for their troops on the Ohio, and their western garrisons, which the french valued at 800,000 livres. The lieutenant colonel alfo took 9 veffels, from eight to eighteen guns, which were all the french had upon the lake, two of them (one richly laden) were brought to Ofwego, and the reft, with all the magazines, he burnt and deftroyed ; together with the fort, artillery, ftores, &c. agreeable to the instructions the lieutenant colonel received from general'Abercrombie, finishing his expedition with equal honour to himfelf, and advantage to his country.

But I must here make a few remarks on the general's ordering Mr. Bradstreet to destroy fort Frontenac. That post is so firong by nature, that had he ordered it to be fortified, a garrison of 3 or 400 men to be left in it, and the vessels to be preferved and kept cruifing cruifing on the lake, it has been very juftly thought that the french would have fuffered much more feverely. It could then have refifted any force they could have brought againft it; and, by its fituation, would have cut off the communication between Canada and all their fettlements on the Ohio and adjacent country, which would foon have proved a fatal ftroke to the french empire in those parts.

The fuccefs which lieutenant colonel Bradstreet met with at fort Frontenac, was of great affiftance to the expedition which had been undertaken against fort du Quefne, under brigadier general Forbes. That gallant officer, with about 6000 men, after having taken the greateft pains to collect them at Philadelphia, marched from thence, the latter end of june, by Carlifle, Rayf-town, and fort Cumberland. It is inconceivable what difficulties he met with in this tedious march of fome months, through an unknown woody country, continually harraffed by the enemy's indians; nothing but the most prudent circumspection in the general could have conducted the army fafe, through fuch an almost impracticable rout. The 14th of feptember, major Grant, with an advanced guard of 800 men, came in fight of fort du Quefne, having marched fo forward with an unaccountable defign of taking the fort by a coup de main ; and the party being very badly conducted, was defeated by the enemy, who fallied out of the fort, and attacked him, killing a great many, and difperfing the reft. However, the french found the indians wavered in their obedience, in proportion as the english army advanced, for general Forbes had previoufly engaged them to act a neutral part, after thoroughly convincing them in feveral skirmishes, that all their attempts upon his advanced posts, were vain : this determined the french to abandon the fort, which they did : having deftroyed all the works, they fell down the Ohio the 24th of november, towards their more northern fettlements, to the number of 4 or 500 men; and the next day general Forbes erected the englifh flag on fort du Quefne, which he named Pittfburg. He directly fet about re-fortifying it, as well as circumftances would permit, and left it too ftrong to be attacked by any force which the french had in those parts. The general's health was fo. extremely bad, as would permit him only to give the neceffary orders, and lasted just long enough for him to fee the effects of his conduct and courage. He died on his return to Philadelphia, beloved by his friends and regreted by his enemies.

to

In this manner we became mafters of that important fortrefs, which was the occafion of a deftructive war being kindled, and fpread from one end of the world to the other. The lofs of it was a terrible ftroke to the french in north America; the whole country bordering on the Ohio, and its branches was directly reduced to the obedience of the englifh, as the indians, as foon as ever the french abandoned the fort, came and made their fubmiffion to the general. This conqueft, in a manner divided their fettlements of Canada and Louifiana *. On

* It is not confiftent with the flortnefs of the plan of this work, to give an account of all the brave actions performed at fea by our privateers and fingle fhips of war; but there is fomething fo extraordinary in what captain Forreft, of his majefly's fhip Augusta, of 60 guns, effected, that it would be unpardonable to omit it; that gentleman, with the above fingle fhip, attacked and took the following fleet:

On the whole, although general Abercrombie failed in his attempt on Ticonderoga, yet this campaign in north America was extremely glorious. That moft valuable and important fortrefs of Louifburg, with the iflands of Cape Breton and St. John conquered; fort du Quefne abandoned; and fort Frontenac deftroyed : thefe are events which will adorn the annals of Britain to the lateft pofterity. No fucceffes were ever more highly advantageous to Great Britain, than thefe; they were entirely national, and tended to fecure our american fettlements, in the greateft degree, those natural fources of our naval ftrength and power. The french felt the weight of the english power in every part of the world. It was now directed and put in motion by ministers of capacity and genius. The coaft of France itfelf had been infulted; and it was refolved in the british cabinet to continue those expeditions. Accordingly, on the rft of August, commodore Howe, with his fleet and transports, fet fail from St. Hellen's, having on board the little army, which had before been under the command of the duke of Marlborough, but was commanded now by lieut. general Bligh; with his royal highness prince Edward, who came down from London, to be prefent at this expedition, in quality of midshipman, and whofe prefence diffused an universal joy amongst the fleet and army. In a few days they came before Cherbourg, the object of the expedition; and perceived that the french had entrenched themfelves by a line running from Ecceundeville, that stands about two miles from Cherbourg, along the coaft for four or five miles;

This is fo very amazing, that one would think it impofible for one fingle fhip, without a friend in view, to take fo many; but how much more furprifing is it, when we know that this was performed within three leagues of one of their principal harbours, Pitit Guave in St. Domingo. This brave captain had before, in the fame flation with three men of war, attacked eight french ones, and got the victory, though not with the fame advantage as is difplayed above. with feveral batteries, at proper diffances. Behind thefe intrenchments the french troops appeared, both horfe and foot; they did not advance to the open beach, as their defences did not reach fo far. The bomb-ketches lying in fhore, played upon their intrenchments, not only in the ufual way, but alfo with ball mortars, which threw a great quantity of balls; thefe were well directed, and feemed greatly to difconcert the french cavalry. On the adjoining fields was a great number of peafants, reaping the corn; and, in a meadow directly oppofite to the forces, there was one man employed in making hay with great composure, as if the landing was not worth his notice. Prince Edward went on board the Pallas, one of the fhips intended for battering the forts; afterwards visited the bomb-ketches, that he might fee the manner of working the mortars.

On the 6th, the landing was effected; the flat-bottomed boats rowing towards the fhore, with more regularity than appeared in the former difembarkation in the bay of Cancalle. Commodore Howe had placed the ketches and men of war fo judicioufly, that they covered the landing in fuch an effectual manner, that the enemy durst not advance beyond their intrenchments. The troops leaped into the water, and were foon formed on the beach, with a natural breaftwork before them. Never did an enemy behave in a more daftardly manner; they retired with only firing a few shot, and left the english to finish their landing in the utmost fecurity. As foon as the greatest part of the troops were landed, it was expected that they would have marched to the village of Querque-ville; but the general thought proper to remain at Erville, near the place where they landed. The troops were there encamped at night, in a very irregu-lar manner, on a fpot of ground, not more in extent than 400 paces; fo that had the enemy attacked them them in the front and on the left, they would have been obliged to fight with infinite difadvantage. This ftrange conduct was quite contrary to the maxim in war, never to occupy any ground, but where you can exert your whole force to the beft advantage; and no good apology can be made, for hampering an army by a confined fituation, in the face of a retiring enemy *.

The next day after landing, the forces entered Cherbourg without opposition, the town being open towards the land, they proceeded to deftroy the fortifications, bason, mole, &c. all which had been built with excellent materials, and at a vaft expence. But this fervice was not performed in the most regular manner; the difcipline of the troops was much violated, and the inhabitants of Cherbourg, with reafon complained very much of the foldiers marauding; they were courteoufly heard, but received no relief. Unfortunately the troops had difcovered fome magazines of wine, which occasioned much delay in the demolition of the works, by the drunkennefs of the foldiers. But in this scene of diffolute behaviour, the foot guards exhibited a laudable example to the rest of the troops, by the strictness of their discipline. All the ships in the harbour were burnt; and the town and country round it laid under contribution, and hoftages taken for 18,000 l. of it. All the cannon + were put on board a danish ship in the harbour, and fent under convoy to England. As foon as thefe feveral operations were executed, the troops re-embarked the 16th, with great expedition and equal fafety.

Although this expedition to Cherbourg did the french fo much damage, and was confequently fo advantageous to us; still the MANNER in which it was conducted, reflected no great honour on the nation. Discipline, the very foul of armies, and more especially fmall ones, was very much neglected. Many very falfe steps were committed ; one I have instanced : another was, the creating a delay for the fake of marching towards Cherbourg in one body, when there was no enemy to fear. The tedious manner in which the works were demolifhed, owing to the neglect of difcipline, is fo well known, that I need not repeat it. The fuccess which attended the expedition, was much more owing to bad conduct, and cowardly behaviour of our enemies, than to any merit that can be discovered in the conducting it*. But I should here, in justice to the commodore and fea officers, observe, that they gained great honour, by their skill in embarking and dif-embarking the troops. After having been two days in the harbour without feeing an enemy, the fleet fet fail the 18th, and the 23d arrived in Weymouth road; being driven there by contrary winds.

* One inftance of mifmanagement I must be allowed to quote : " The general, attended by fome of the commanding officers, going out to reconnoitre with a detachment of grenadiers, and a party of light horfe, fome of the french cavalry appeared at a diftance. Captain Lindfey, of the light horfe was immediately ordered to attack them; at the requeft (as it is faid) of fome young gentlemen, who were defirous of feeing the horfe engage: he accordingly advanced at a brifk pace, without detaching from his front and flanks; and falling in with a body of infantry, poffed behind a hedge, received a fevere fire, which obliged the light horfe to wheel about, and retire. Captain Lindfey was mortally wounded by a mufket fhot, and died, univerfally regretted, as a worthy young man, and one of the moft intelligent, active, and induftrious officers in the fervice. What pity fo much merit fhould have been unneceffarily thrown away, to gratify the rafh impertinent curiofity of thofe, who had no right to dictate on fuch an oceafion." Elliot's campaign, p. 82.

It was his majefty's inftructions, that this arma-ment, fhould proceed in their attempts on the coaft of France; when they fet fail from Cherbourg, their defign was to proceed on the coaft of St. Maloes; but the contrary winds detained them fome time: on the 25th of august they made the french shore; and two days after anchored in the bay of St. Lunar, about two leagues to the westward of St. Maloes, and there landed without opposition. As foon as that was effected, a party of grenadiers was detached, who burned 14 or 15 veffels in the harbour of St. Briac. The 27th, 28th, and 29th were spent in reconnoitring and deliberating on what could be done. In one of these excursions, prince Edward advanced fo near St. Maloes, as to expose his perfon to fome fhot from the town. A ball grazing, en ricochet, near the place where he ftood, a ferjeant fprung before him, to defend his royal highness with his body; the prince was fo pleafed with this un-common mark of courage and attachment, that, he rewarded the man with a handfome gratification.

Nothing could give greater furprife, than the choice that was made of St. Lunar bay to land in; by its fituation, it was very plain that St. Maloes was the object of the expedition; and it was very remarkable, that now their force was weaker than when under the duke of Marlborough, they fhould think of attacking that town, which before was too ftrong for more numerous forces; but there was fomething fo extremely abfurd and unaccountable in the whole management of this affair, that I cannot pretend to form any judgment on the defigns of the commander.

The army was landed but a few days, when an attack on St. Maloes was found utterly impracticable; it was therefore refolved to penetrate further into the country; moving however, in fuch a manner as to be near the fleet, in cafe it fhould be neceffary to re-embark. What the troops were to march into the country for, was very difficult at that time, or even at this, to know; for there was no other object of importance enough to be attacked, in the neigh-bourhood befides, St. Maloes. The march was begun the 8th of feptember; and the commodore finding the bay of St. Lunar extremely dangerous for the fhips to ride in, moved up to the bay of St. Cas, about three leagues to the weftward. The 10th, the troops had reached the village of Malignon, being continu-ally engaged in skirmishing with parties of the ene-my, and with some loss. For by this time the duke d'Aguillon, who commanded the french troops in Britanny, with an army of 12 battalions and fix fqua-drons of regulars, and two regiments of militia, with a train of artillery, was advanced within fix miles of the englifh army : and, although the enemy was fo near, ftill the english encamped with as much fecu-rity and as little precaution, as if the enemy had been at the distance of 20 leagues; and although the de-ferters had assured the general of their being fo near him.

The bay of St. Cas, being diffant about three miles, was reconnoited for re-embarkation. The Coldftream regiment of guards had already poffeffed the ground to the right of the village of St. Cas, by the windmill. The bay was covered by an intrenchment, which the french had made to prevent the englifh landing; it was proposed that this should be turned against the enemy, and some progress was made in that work; but it was interrupted for want of tools. In short, the bay was found a very improper place for embarking troops; and a proposal was made, that it should be performed from an open fair beach on the left, between St. Cas and St. Guildo. This advice was most unfortunately neglected; and the ill confe-U 2 quences quences foon appeared. It was determined on the 10th, in a council of war, that they fhould re-embark with all expedition.

Early in the morning on the 11th, to the aftonifument of every mortal, the GENERAL was beat; the ASSEMBLY following as ufual; this conduct actually feemed as if the greatest pains was taken to inform the french of their departure. Had the troops decamped in the night without noife, they would in all proba-bility have arrived at the beach before the french had known of their motions. The english were immediately in motion; yet, though the diftance did not exceed three miles, the halts and interruptions were fo frequent that the army did not arrive at St. Cas, before nine o'clock. The enemy did not appear till they had reached the shore : the embarkation of the troops was immediately begun ; but by fome miftake in orders, they were rowed too far in quest of their respective ships; so that an unnecessary space of time was lost; and when they did return, they were most infamoufly employed in carrying away horfes and cows, inftead of men; notwithstanding all the attention and care of the SEA-OFFICERS, who behaved extremely well. The french first appeared by a windmill to the left; and played on the troops embarking, from a battery of ten guns, and eight mortars. They foon after marched down a hollow way, to attack the english; but as foon as they were on the beach, the ships of the fleet played on them so feverely, as to put them into great confusion; but they formed in a long line against the english, as they came down from the hollow way. All the grena-diers of the army, and one half of the first regiment of guards, remained on shore, under the command of major general Dury; who was advised to attack the enemy with bayonets fixed, before a confiderable number of them had arrived on the beach; but this advice advice was neglected, and the opportunity loft. The engagement began with an irregular fire from right to left; and after a fhort, but unequal conteft, the ammunition of the english foldiers, which was far from being complete, failed; the men were then feized with a pannic, they were foon broke and fled in the utmost confusion. Sir John Armitage was shot thro' the head at the beginning of the action; many of the officers fell; and a great number of men were flain. It foon became a dreadful carnage : fome ran into the fea, and endeavoured to fave their lives, by fwimming towards the boats, which were ordered to give them all possible assistance. Some officers swam near two miles before they were taken up; general Dury perished in the sea. The men were butchered both on the fhore and in the water; many in fwimming were killed by the fhot and fhells from the french cannon and mortars. Several of the frigates continued, during this time, to fire on the french army, and great part of the carnage was owing to that; for they being filenced by a fignal from the commodore, the french officers and foldiers behaved inftantly with the greatest generofity and moderation, in giving immediate quarter and protec-tion to the conquered; fuch a noble behaviour as the english had very little reason to expect, in return for their marauding, pillaging, burning, and other ex-ceffes. We had a thousand choice troops killed, wounded, and taken prifoners, and confidering the shot from the frigates, which made lanes through the enemy, their lofs could not be much lefs. One instance of heroic bravery, I must be allowed to quote. Commodore lord Howe, perceiving that the failors in the boats were a little staggered by the enemy's fire, exhibited a remarkable inftance of intrepidity, by ordering himfelf to be rowed in his own boat U_3 through through the thickeft of the fire, and bringing off as many men as it would carry.

Such was the unfortunate end of this expedition to the coaft of France. The lofs was but triffing; but then it caft a difreputation on our arms; and difpirited the people, as much as it exulted those of France. It might have been more fuccessful; nay, we may almost fay it would have been fo; had the army been conducted in a different manner; but never was fuch weaknefs difcovered in any military expedition. What could the general continue his operations for after the defign upon St. Maloes was laid afide? Why did he not re-imbark immediately, and proceed to a more proper place for making an attempt ? What reason can be given for neglecting every piece of intelligence that was received of the enemy's force and motions; for communicating to them all those midnight motions by beat of drum, when all poffible care ought to have been taken to prevent them from procuring that knowledge? For what reafon did the troops loiter away feven hours in a march only of three miles! And why were they reimbarked at a place where no measures had been taken for their cover or defence? These queries, I believe, will be very difficult to answer. In short, fuch folly and indifcretion appeared throughout this expedition, that it is with concern, I am obliged to confefs, neither Britain nor her general gained any great honour by it. Such military enterprizes, in a country intirely unknown; and in the face of a fuperior enemy, will never be attended with either honour or advantage to the nation, unless conducted by a commander of approved valour, conduct, and experience. In these expeditions every moment is critical; and the whole army ought on fuch occafions to go through all their manœuvres with the fame alertnefs and circumfpection as if an enemy was in fight.

fight. It fhould be remembered, that oftentimes every peafant in the country proves a dangerous one; and that nothing will ballance all the difadvantages, which an invading army lies under; but the greateft caution, the ftricteft difcipline, and the never omitting to catch the decifive moment, in which every movement and action can only with propriety be made.

Campaign on the Rhine. Army under duke Ferdinand paffes that river. Battle of Crevelt. Battle of Sanderhausen. Battle of Meer. General Inhoff joins the english forces under the duke of Marlborough. Hanoverian army repasses the Rhine. Occupies the posts on the Lippe. Battle of Lanwerenhagen. The two armies go into winter quarters. Remarks on the campaign.

HE war this campaign contained many great actions, in every part of the world; but particularly in Germany. I left duke Ferdinand of Brunfwick at the head of the hanoverians driving the french army, under the marshal prince de Clermont, before him, which had already passed the Rhine. The duke prepared with all expedition to pass it after them: and to the astonishment of all Europe he effected it in the face of a superior army, and without loss.

The 25th of may, the greateft part of his army was encamped at Notteln; they marched from thence to Coefveld, and the head quarters were fixed at Dulmen, the 27th. A detachment of feveral battalions and fquadrons, under major general Wangenheim, affembled the 26th at Dorften, with orders to advance himfelf to the gates of Duffeldorp; and to caufe a corps under general Scheither to pafs the Rhine at Duyfbourg. This paffage was executed in the night, between the 29th and 30th, with fuch fuccefs, that Scheither having attacked with bayonets, three battalions of french who oppofed him, entirely defeated them. On the 29th, the grand army marched early early in the morning from Dulmen towards Dorften, and encamped at Limbeke, from whence lieutenant general Wutgenau was detached towards Weffel, with a body of infantry and cavalry, he advanced by Raefveld and encamped at Ringenburg. In the mean time, his ferene highnefs the duke himfelf, went to Boecholt; and the advanced guard of the army marched on the 30th to Emmerick, being followed by the reft of the army, which was encamped at Vraffelt; and in the evening of the 31ft, the whole army was in motion to pafs the Rhine. The duke's defign was to crofs it at Lobit, but an unforefeen accident prevented him: however, in the night of the 1ft of june, the paffage was fuccefsfully effected near Herven.

The main army having thus paffed, the prince ordered the bridge to be carried up the river to Rees, and there laid on the 6th, whilft a corps under general Durchtlechen croffed the river in boats; as foon as the bridge was finished at Rees, the detachment under general Wutgenau also passed the river; and next day, another under general Sporken croffed. On the 7th, the whole army marched from Goch, and encamped at Wees. The next day it proceeded to Uden, and marched to attack the enemy, who, as foon as the duke had paffed the Rhine, retired into a very ftrong camp on the eminences at Zanten; and on the 10th, the two armies were in fight of each other; the next day the prince reconnoitred the french camp, and found it acceffible only on the left, towards Guilders; by a masterly motion, he obliged the prince of Clermont to quit this advantageous camp at Rheinburg, and to retire towards Meurs, in the night of the 12th. The duke then gave a new poffeffion to his army, by occupying fome heights, commonly called St. Anthony's mountains, having the town of Meurs in his front, at two leagues diffance, and the right towards the village of St.

St. Jannigherg; by the 14th of june, this polition was effected; and the next day the duke was informed that the french army was advancing in four columns on his right; on which intelligence, the whole hanoverian army was immediately drawn up in order of battle. His highnefs went himfelf to reconnoitre, and diffinctly faw a large body of french coming over the plain of Hulfte, and marching towards Crevelt; but not knowing whether it was the whole army, or only a detachment, he halted till towards the evening, when he received certain information, that the french army had marched towards Nuys, and that the troops which he faw was a detachment fent to take poffeffion of the poft of Crevelt.

His ferene highness was furprised to find that the prince of Clermont should fend this detachment at fo great a diftance from his grand army; he wanted to penetrate into the defigns of the french general, whether the prince would advance towards Crevelt, or whether the detachment there would fall back on the prince of Clermont. His highnefs, that he might be perfectly acquainted with the defigns of that general; ordered the prince of Holftein, with three battalions and fifteen squadrons, to march early in the morning of the 18th, towards Hulfte; and general Wangenheim, with four battalions and four fquadrons, to crofs the Rhine at Duyfbourg, and advance towards Meurs; he alfo detached the hereditary prince of Brunfwick, with 12 battalions and 12 Iquadrons, the 19th, towards Kempen, whilft the prince of Holftein advanced towards Hulfte. The hereditary prince was also ordered, that in cafe he perceived no change in the difpolition of the enemy's army or detachment, he fhould march the next day directly towards Ruremond, and endeavour to poffefs himfelf of a magazine there. Duke Ferdinand himfelf then reconnoitered the enemy at Kempen the next day; and perceived fome movements in the camp camp of M., St. Germain, who commanded the detachment at Crevelt, which inclined him to believe, that general intended to march against the prince of Holftein at Hulfte; and was foon after informed, that the whole french army had quitted Nuys, and were advanced to Crevelt; this motion of the enemy was made in confequence of the duke's detachments; and he inftantly took fuch measures, as the plan he had formed required. All the troops he could difpofe of were united the 20th in camp, the right of which extended towards Kempen, and the left towards Hulfte. On the 21st, M. de St. Germain's corps decamped, and marched towards Aurad, where it joined their grand army. In making this motion, they abandoned the town of Crevelt, which the duke immediately took poffeffion of. The 22d he reconnoitered the enemy on the fide of St. Anthony, and refolved to march the next day to attack them in their camp. His ferene highnefs gave the command of his left wing, confifting of 18 battalions and 28 fquadrons, to lieutenant general Sporken : The right wing, confifting of 24 fquadrons and 16 battalions, he entrufted to the prince of Holftein and general Wangenheim, and the infantry was commanded by the hereditary prince.

The french army was ftrongly fituated, their right wing extended towards a very thick wood, having in its front the village of Ravenfgaet, and the town of Crevelt; its left bordered on another thick wood, near the town of Anrad, having before the front of the whole army a ftrong retrenchment, with a foffe; behind which was placed their cannon.

The 23d, at four in the morning, the hanoverian army began to move; its right advanced in two columns; one by the village of St. Anthony, and the other croffed the wood, and took the rout of Suchvelen. Its left advanced in one column, a little to the right of Crevelt. The ftrength of the enemy's front, front, determined the duke to make his attack at the village of Anrad; but to rife doubts in the enemy, he ordered general Sporcken, who commanded the left of his line of battle; and general Oberg, who commanded the center, (as foon as his highnefs himfelf began the attack at Anrad) to attack the front of the enemy, and do their utmost to penetrate it; recommending to them to make good use of their heavy artillery, in order to oblige the french to employ their attention as much on their right wing and center, as on their left, and to engage and divide their attention equally in three different places, which would prevent them from fending any reinforcement to the real attack, for fear of weakening themfelves, in fome part or other, where he might make imprefion.

These dispositions being made, his serene highness put himself at the head of the grenadiers of the right wing; and having arrived at Anrad, drew the whole wing up in order of battle, in the plain before that village. It was one o'clock at noon before the enemy began to act. The duke's artillery being greatly fuperior to that of the french, facilitated the means of his infantry's forming themfelves in greater fecurity; but this was not effected till after a cannonade, as violent as it was well fupported, and the enemy's refiftance was very brave: but the duke found that he must use small arms, to drive the enemy entirely from their intrenchments; wherefore the hereditary prince put himfelf at the head of the first line, and advanced with the whole front directly towards them; the fire then became extremely hot on each fide, and neither difcontinued, or in any degree diminished for two hours and an half; and about five o'clock in the afternoon, the prince affifted by the generals Kilmanfegge and Wangenheim, forced two ditches in the front of the enemy, that were in a wood; and the other regiments of infantry did the fame, all along their their front; upon which, that part of the enemy's infantry retired in the greateft confusion; but was covered by their horfe, although the hanoverian artillery kept a terrible fire on them all the while. During the whole affair, the artillery of the left and center, under generals Sporcken and Oberg, had done great execution; but as the diftance they were from the duke himfelf, made them uncertain what turn affairs had taken with him, they never ventured to attack the enemy's front opposite to them; fo that the enemy's right wing and center retired in the greateft order towards Nueys, which was the rout of the reft of their army in the flight.

Seven thousand of the best troops of France were either killed, wounded, or taken prisoners in this battle: and to the great concern both of the french, and even of their enemies, the count de Gisors, only fon of the marshal duke de Bellisse, not above 25 years of age, newly married to the heires of an illustrious house, himfelf the last hope of a most noble family, was mortally wounded at the head of his regiment, which followed his heroic example, in making incredible efforts. This amiable young nobleman, who fell in his first campaign, was one of the best and most accomplished men that did honour to his country in the prefent age *.

One capital miltake in the difpolition of the prince de Clermont, and which we have reafon to believe, in great part, occafioned his defeat, was his not polting a ftrong corps at the entrance into the wood, on the left of Anrad. Had the flank of his left been as ftrong as his whole line of front, duke Ferdinand would never have dared to attack him.

The manœuvres of that commander, preceding the battle, were excellent; and his conduct in it, fuch as did the greateft honour to his military capacity, and the bravery of his troops: but ftill the victory, though great, was far from being either entire entire or decifive : the french army being near their own frontiers, were very foon fbrongly reinforced; fo that they were enabled foon to oppofe the hanoverian army again, in a defenfive manner; and even fent a confiderable reinforcement to their army under the prince de Soubife, on the other fide of the Rhine, which was ravaging the landgraviate of Heffe.

In the mean time, duke Ferdinand followed his blow; and having paffed the Rhine with a large detachment, appeared, on the 28th of June, before Duffeldorp, a city of great importance, fituated on that river. The garrifon of 2000 men, marched out on honourable terms, the 8th of July, after fuftaining a very fevere bombardment. * The prince left a garrifon in it, and threw a bridge of boats over the river; which he knew would be of great fervice to him, in cafe of being obliged to repais it. The army of France, with its reinforcements, received a new commander; the prince of Clermont was removed, and marfhal Contades appointed commander in chief.

Duke Ferdinand was in hopes that the prince of Yfenburg, who commanded the heffian troops againft the prince de Soubife, would find him employment for fome time. He refolved therefore to transfer the feat of war, from the Rhine to the Maes, think-

* Extract from a letter of the duke de Belleisle's to marshal Contades, july 15, 1758.

"You tell me, that you cannot bring yourfelf to imagine, that a town, fuch as Duffeldorp, fhould furrender without being befieged. We are ftill more furprifed, that the count Clermont fuffered it, having it abfolutely in his power to have prevented it, by making ufe of the means which he had at hand; (and it will ftill be the more grievous, if, what I am afraid of, we have left our artillery and military flores of all kinds there) the enemy having no troops on the right fide of the river, while we had always a free communication with that city. The confequences of the lofs, or keeping of Duffeldorp, were fo effential and decifive, that they could not efcape the general, or even private men. It was eafy to forefee the embarrafs it would occafion. ing, that by carrying the war into the enemies country, he might draw the french from the Rhine, and oblige the prince de Soubife to come to the affiftance of the main army, under the marfhal Contades. To execute this plan, the duke marched towards Ruremond, the latter end of july; but the long and heavy rains, which had fell for fome time paft, retarded his motions extremely; and in the mean time an unfortunate piece of news arrived, which obliged him to change his plan of operations.

The duke de Broglio had been fent by marshal Contades, with a strong detachment, to reinforce the prince of Soubife in Heffe. Prince Yfenburg commanded 7000 Heffians against him. The french, amounting to 12000 men, attacked the prince on the 23d of july, and after a most obstinate fight, gained a victory. This affair was attended with very bad confequences; for it gave the french the pof-feffion of the Wefer, and opened them a road into Weftphalia; where they might attack the reinforcement of english troops, under the command of the duke of Marlborough, which was marching to join prince Ferdinand. In this situation, the prince had no other option, but a victory over the french, or to repais the Rhine. The former was extremely difficult to attempt, for Contades declined coming to an engagement, in the most careful manner; and it was dangerous to remain long in a polition, where he had the french army on one wing, and the fortrefs of Guelders on the other, befides feveral pofts, within reach of obstructing the convoys and sub-fistence of his army. His highness determined to march back to the Rhine.

In the mean time, general Inhoff had been fome time posted on the right of the Rhine, in a strong camp near Meer; with a defign to cover the bridge at Rees; to fecure a confiderable magazine; and to keep open a communication between the english reinforcements, (304) inforcements, and the duke's army ; his corps did not amount to quite fix battalions, and four fquadrons, together about 3000 men. M. de Chevert, one of the greateft generals at that time, in the french army, had alfo fome time before, paffed the Rhine, with an intention of making himfelf mafter of Duffeldorp ; but the heavy rains, and fome other crofs accidents, having fruftrated his fcheme, he inftantly formed another, of more importance. It was to drive general Inhoff from his ftrong poft; to burn the bridge at Rees ; to make himfelf mafter of the magazine ; and to cut off the communication of the englifh troops from the duke's army. A moft noble and judicious project, and worthy of the general who formed it. He collected fome ftraggling detachments, and his whole corps amounted to 12000 men.

Duke Ferdinand would have reinforced Inhoff, had it been practicable; but his army was too much fatigued, to begin fuch a march, as would have been neceffary; and the extraordinary overflowings of the Rhine, which rendered the bridge at Rees impaffable, was an additional difficulty; fo that the general had no refource, but in his own good conduct, and the great bravery of his troops. On the 4th of auguft, he received intelligence that the enemy was to pafs the Lippe, and would march to Rees directly. As he knew they might get thither by turning his camp; he refolved to decamp, to cover that place; which he accordingly did; but hearing nothing farther of the enemy, and believing his former advices falfe, he returned to his old camp at Meer; where he had no fooner placed his advanced guards, but they found themfelves engaged with the enemy, who had advanced from Wefel.

Inhoff's front was covered with coppices and ditches; with a rifing ground on his right, from whence whence he perceived that the french were marching into that difficult ground ; he refolved to attack them as foon as they entered it, well knowing the great difference there is in attacking and being attacked. He accordingly placed a regiment upon his right, in a coppice, in order to fall upon the left of the enemy when quite uncovered; and gave orders to the other regiments to march, with drums beating up to the enemy, and to attack them with bayonets, as foon as they should hear the fire of that in the coppice on the right. These judicious orders being executed by the whole corps, with the utmost spirit, had so great an effect, that after a refiftance of about half an hour, the enemy left the field of battle, eleven pieces of cannon, many prifoners; and most of their ammunition and baggage, to the hanoverians, who drove them under the cannon of Wefel. General Inhoff delayed not a moment purfuing this victory, fo glorioufly won over fo great a fuperiority. He directly took proper care to fecure his magazines, and then guitted his post at Meer, and marched with the utmost diligence, towards the rout of the english forces, and joined them fafely; an event, which had hitherto been attended with fo much difficulty.

During this interim, prince Ferdinand marched his army still nearer the Maese, and encamped between Ruremond and Schwalm, the latter end of july; the enemy continuing in their camp at Dalem. The beginning of august, he marched towards Dulcken, and finding it neceffary to attack the post of Watch-tendonck, the hereditary prince prepared to execute that piece of fervice. This place is an island, fur-rounded by the Niers, of a very difficult approach, although without fortifications. That gallant young prince, not being able immediately to get down the bridge, the enemy had drawn up, without giving them time to recollect themfelves; threw himfelf into the river, and paffed it with fome companies of grenadiers, X nadiers, who followed his example, and drove the french away with their bayonets; and in the evening the army passed the bridges there. On the 4th, it marched to Rhynberg, and in two days it reached Santen. Prince Ferdinand intended to have paffed the Rhine at Rhynberg, but the prodigious flood in the river, occafioned by continual rains, rendered it impracticable; and the fame reason made it impossible to use the bridge at Rees. It was therefore found neceffary to march further down; and in the night between the 8th and 9th, a bridge was laid over the river at Griethuyfen. The french forefeeing the duke's defign, had prepared fome boats, of a particular invention, to demolifh it, which they fent down the river from Wefel; but they were all deftroyed by fome armed barks, before they could put their defign in execution. In short, prince Ferdinand passed this fa-mous river the 10th, without the least opposition from the french; fo admirably had he laid his plan.

The prince, as foon as he was on the other fide of the Rhine, withdrew his garrifon from Duffeldorp; of which place the french took immediate poffeffion. Marfhal Contades alfo paffed the Rhine, at Wefel, the 12th and 13th. The prince took poffeffion of all the pofts on the Lippe, and was able to keep the french army from attempting to penetrate any further on that fide. Contades was encamped for fome time between Recklinghaufen and Dortmund; and the prince between Coesfeld and Dulmen. The other division of the french forces, under the prince de Soubife, had made but little progrets in Heffe Caffel, where the prince of Yfenburg ftill kept him at bay; but, on the 10th and 11th of feptember Soubife took poffeffion of Gottingen, and advanced as far as Eimbeck, near which place, the prince of Yfenburg was encamped. This general's bufinefs was to protect the courfe of the Wefer, and to cover the electorate

(307) rate of Hanover. It was here that the hanoverian pofts were weakeft. The french had no hopes of penetrating into Hanover by the Lippe, which prince Ferdinand guarded himfelf; but it appeared more practicable to drive the prince of Yfenburg from his pofts. To accomplifh this, marfhal Contades fent a ftrong detachment to the prince de Soubife, which augmented his army to 30,000 men. Prince Ferdi-nand aware of the enemy's defign, detached general Oberg, with a ftrong reinforcement to join prince Yfenburg; but notwithftanding this, the whole force of the allies in Heffe did not exceed 15,000 men. Soon after Oberg's arrival near Caffel, he encamped near Lanwerenhagen, behind Lutternberg; and find-ing that the french were preparing to attack him, he drew up his troops in order of battle; with his right to the Fulde, and his left to a thicket upon an eminence: In this fituation he was attacked on the 30th of feptember, by the whole french army, and after a vigorous refiftance was obliged to retire, with the lofs of 1500 men to Munden; but in fuch good order that his defeat was far from being total.

Had any but the most skilful general commanded the allied army; this unfortunate affair would, in all probability, have been of fatal confequence : but prince Ferdinand, by having eftablished the most ready communications all along the Lippe, deprived the french of an opportunity of making use of their ad-vantage: He marched with the utmost expedition towards Rheda, and prince Yfenburg falling back, joined him with his troops, and by this junction covered the Wefer, without lofing any thing on the fide of the Rhine. The prince well knew, that these movements rather uncovered the electorate of. Hanover : but he also forefaw, that the french would not be able to make any establishment in it; they only in-fested the country with their light troops, who were X 2 fent fent by the marshal Contades*, to carry off and deftroy all the provisions and forage in that country, as well as all Westphalia. This conduct of the french general was in confequence of a plan formed between him and the duke de Belleisse, to reduce all

• The marshal duke de Belleisse, fecretary at war to the french king, in a letter to marshal Contades, of the 26th of september, writes,

"You muft, at any rate, confume all fort of fubfiftance on the higher Lippe, in the neighbourhood of Paderborn, and in the country which lies between the Lippe, Paderborn, and Warfbourg; this will be fo much fubfiftance taken from the enemy, from this day to the end of october. You muft deftroy every thing that you cannot confume, fo as to make a defert of all Weftphalia, from Lipftadt and Munfter, as far as the Rhine, on one hand, and on the other, from the higher Lippe and Paderborn, as far as Caffel; that the enemy may find it quite impracticable to direct their march to the Rhine, or the lower Roer; and this with regard to your army; and with regard to the army under M. de Soubife, that they may not have it in their power to take poffefion of Caffel, and much lefs to march to Marpurg, or to the quarters which he will have along the Lohn, or to thofe which you will occupy, from the lower part of the left fide of the Roer, and on the right fide of the Rhine, as far as Duffeldorp, and at Cologne."

On the 30th of october, he again writes :

" ---- First, You are acquainted with all our political views. Secondly, You know the prefent fituation of all our allies. Thirdly, you know the neceffity of confuming, or deftroying, as far as is poffible, all the fubfiftence, efpecially the forage, betwixt the Wefer and the Rhine, on the one hand; and on the other, betwixt the Lippe, the bishopric of Paderborn, the Dymel, the Fulda, and the Nerra; and fo to make a defert of Weftphalia and Heffe," that the enemy may not be able by any means, to march, with any confiderable force, either towards the Rhine or the Lohn; and that our troops may pass the winter quietly in their quarters : for, as it is now unquestionable, that we cannot make any advances into Germany this year, our principal object must be to refresh our troops, as foon as poffible, that we may be able to make war the following year with more vigor, and take the field very early: it will be no fmall matter, if we shall be able, with a great deal of pains, conftant care, and œconomy, to find the means of supporting all our horfe of every kind, until the month of june." For feveral other extracts from these notable letters, Vide the appendix.

Westphalia,

Westphalia, Hesse, and the neighbouring countries to a defert, in order to prevent prince Ferdinand from marching in the beginning of the next campaign to the Rhine, or the Lohn, and to keep their own quarters undisturbed in the winter. But this infamous fcheme was in a great part defeated by the vigilance good conduct of that gallant young prince.

In this fuccessful manner ended the campaign on the Rhine. I have not interrupted my narrative of it, to make way for the other military transactions in Germany, in their chronological order, as that would have rendered it more obscure, the operations of which, I have given an account, being fo blended together, that they could not with propriety be fe-perated. Seldom has the conduct of any general appeared more confpicuously great, in a defensive campaign, than that of prince Ferdinand in this. Those admirable movements, which enabled him to pass the Rhine without lofs, in the face of a fuperior army; to gain a fignal victory over it; to maintain his ground against it, when reinforced, and rendered still more fuperior; to repais the Rhine with the utmost fafety; and laftly, to chuse his posts in so judicious a manner on the Lippe, as to prevent the enemy from pene-trating further than that river, and this even after they had gained a victory over a large detachment of his army. In short, these several actions, with a thousand skilful manœuvres that must in consequence attend them, are together justly reckoned a perfect model of a defensive campaign.

THE affairs of the king of Pruffia were now greatly changed. At the beginning of the campaign, he acted offenfively, in the utmost extent of the word; but now he found himfelf obliged to act on the defensive : every moment was to him critical. The ruffians, who had been for feveral months marching through Poland and Pruffia, bent their courfe at last, as if they defigned to enter Silefia; but they fuddenly turned towards Brandenburg, and laid fiege to Cuftrin, a little town on the Elbe, almost without fortifications; but which, an army of near 90,000 ruffians were not able in fome weeks to reduce. We may compare their operations at this fiege, with those under Peter the Great at Narva. The ruffians at this day, are little better than barbarians, in point of military still, except feveral general officers, many of them foreigners; but as men they are worfe.

These wretches, whose actions are a difgrace to human nature, had marked their road through Pruffia and Brandenburg, by the most horrible barbarities; to make up for their want of fkill in fieges, they had brought all their formidable train of artillery to bat-ter this little town. They threw fuch an immenfe quantity of bombs and red hot balls into it, that it was foon on fire in every quarter; they fell like hail in the ftreets, and the miferable inhabitants, every where meeting danger, but no where fafety, left their ruinous habitations, and fled many of them naked out of the town, on that fide which was not invefted. But the brave governor, with the greatest courage and fidelity, defended the ruins of the place, with the utmost firmness. The prussian general, count Dohna was posted at Francfort; but all he could do, against a force fo much fuperior to his own, was only to obferve their motions.

Never were the affairs of his pruffian majefty more critical. An army of 90,000 ruffians, was within three days march of Berlin : in Pomerania, the fwedes were greatly fuperior to the generals Weedel and Manteufel, who commanded the pruffian troops in that province : the army of the empire, which had been reinforced with a great body of the auftrians, under general Haddick, had advanced into Saxony, and every day approached nearer to prince Henry; who was ftrongly intrenched at Dippolswalde, with 20,000 men to cover Drefden, and commanded the courfe of the Elbe. Marshal Daun, foreseeing many difficulties in purfuing the king of Pruffia, refolved to march into Saxony, and in conjunction with the army of the empire, under the duke of Deux Ponts, and endeavour to drive prince Henry from his strong post, and get possession of Dresden; and by that means drive the king of Pruffia entirely out of Saxony, which would be depriving him of the only refource for carrying on the war. These reasons determined X 4 hini.

him. He left a large body of troops under the generals Harfch and de Ville, in the fouthern part of Silefia, to draw the attention of the pruffians that way, and marched himfelf towards Saxony, through Lufatia, by Zittau, Gorlitz, and Bautzen; however, he was not able to make prince Henry change his advantageous pofition.

In the mean time, the pruffian monarch being arrived at Frankfort, loft not a moment's time to march againft the ruffians. On the 23d of auguft he paffed the Oder, at Gatavife; and after their prodigious march, refted his army the 24th, and in the evening advanced to Dirmitzel, where he encamped, and made his difpofitions for attacking the enemy the next day; early in the morning, he broke up his camp, and marched forward, in order to wind round the enemy's left flank; in its way, the army paffed the finall river Mitzel: afterwards it filed off by the foreft of Maffin, and the village of Bazels into the plain, where both infantry and cavalry fpreading themfelves on the left flank, till they arrived at Zorndorff; the king then thought that he was come on the back of the enemy, and gave orders for the attack.

The ruffian generals forefeeing his defign, had broke up the fiege of Cuftrin, and marched towards the villages of Zwicker and Zorndorff, where the ground not admitting them to extend in front, they had drawn up their army very judicioufly in four lines, forming a front on every fide, and furrounded by cannon and chevaux de frize : the village of Zwicker covered their right flanks, beyond which their cavalry reached. Prince Maurice of Anhalt Deffau commanded the firft line of the pruffians, under the king; lieutenant general Manteufel, the left wing of infantry; and general Seydlitz conducted the cavalry of that wing.

Thefe

Thefe were the politions of the two armies, when the king gave the word for the attack. The ruffians were an enemy he had never perfonally engaged before; but his troops faw every where fuch horrid marks of their cruelty, as fpurred them on with the moft animated ardor to engage, and be revenged on those barbarians. Every thing that was dear to the king of Pruffia depended on this day; if he lost it, the confequences must be fatal, confidering the vast fuperiority of his enemies in Saxony. In short, all his dominions were at stake.

The battle began on the 25th of august, at nine o'clock in the morning. The pruffian infantry began to attack the village under cover of an uninterrupted and terrible fire of cannon and mortars, which rained on the right wing of the ruffians for two hours without the least intermission. Never was there a more dreadful cannonade; the ruffian foot, which although raw and unexperienced, fuftaned a moft fhocking flaughter; whole ranks fell, and their places were in ftantly fupplied by new regiments. Their first line continued immoveable, till they had fired away all their charges, and then rushed forward on the prussian infantry; which fuddenly, and with an unaccountable pannic gave way, in the prefence of their fovereign, before the broken battalions of the Muscovites, and after their own cannonade had in a manner already gained the victory. This was now the critical mo-ment, on which every thing depended; the battle was in fuspence, and the prussian infantry retreating. The event of that great day depended on an inftant; it was neglected by the ruffian general; but the king of Pruffia improved it: Had general Fermor directly brought on his horfe, to disperse the retiring battalions of his enemy, this day had been fatal to the pruffian greatnefs; but the king, by a mafterly and rapid motion, brought all the cavalry of his right wing to the center, which, with general Seydlitz at their their head, made a most furious attack upon the Muscovite foot, uncovered by their horfe, and drove them back with a most miferable flaughter : this gave the repulfed infantry time to recollect and form them-felves; returning to the charge with a rage, exafpe-rated by their late difgrace, they very foon changed the fortune of the day. The ruffians being thrown into the most terrible confusion, plundered their own baggage, which was between the lines, and intoxicated themselves with brandy, they no longer diftinguished friends from foes, but fired upon each other; and being crammed together in a narrow fpace; a horrible and undiffinguishing carnage enfued, as well by fword and bayonet, as by the pruffian artillery, charged with cartridge fhot, which fired continually on them, at not 20 yards diftance. Still they obstinately perfifted in not quitting the ground; but one of their generals towards the evening, with a chofen corps made a judicious attack on the right wing of the pruffians; that officer loft most of his men, but by drawing the king's attention that way, the broken remains of their infantry had leifure to withdraw to a new poft in the night for rallying the reft of their army.

The lofs of the prufians did not exceed 2000 men, killed, wounded, and prifoners; but that of the ruflians amounted to 10,000 dead on the fpot; 10,000 wounded, moft of them mortally; and about 2000 prifoners: of two particular regiments, which before the battle confifted of 4600 men, only 1500 were left. Their lofs in this dreadful day, amounted in the whole to upwards of 22,000 men.

The next day, the king of prufia renewed the attack, by a very brifk cannonade; but the ruffians finding no fafety in any thing but a retreat, marched to Landfperg on the frontiers of Poland. Never was victory more complete. An immenfe train of artillery, 37 colours, five standards, and feveral kettledrums, drums, and their military cheft, containing 200,000 l. fterl. were taken. Yet, the auftrians warmly afferted, that the ruffians gained the victory; but nothing fpoke fo plainly on whofe fide it fell, as its confequences; the king cleared that part of his dominions from his enemies, and was enabled to march to the affiftance of the other; general Fermor's afking leave * to bury his

* As foon as the battle was over, general Fermor wrote the following letter to count Dohna.

"As this day's battle hath left many dead to be buried, and many wounded men to be dreffed on both fides, I have thought proper to afk your excellency, whether it would not be fit to conclude a fufpenfion of arms for two or three days? General Brown, who is extremely weak by reaton of his wounds, having need of a room and other conveniences, which are neceffary in his prefent fituation, moft humbly entreats his majefly to fend a pafiport for him and his attendants, that he may remove to a proper place. I have the hopour to be, &c.

Count Douna's answer.

" I have the honour to answer, the letter which your excellency was pleased to write to me yesterday; and in confequence of it to inform you, that the king, my maller, having gained the battle, and remained master of the field, his majesty will not fail to give the necessary orders for burying the dead, and taking care of the wounded on both fides. His majesty thinks that a sufpension of arms is usual in the case of a siege, but not after a battle. His excellency general Brown, if still alive, shall have the passforts he asks most readily; and all possible relief shall be given to the other generals who are prisoners.

The cruel burning of all the villages, which is not yet differntinued, fhews an intention not to fpare the king's effates in any fhape : but I fhall not now enter into repetitions, on a fubject I have fo often mentioned. I fhall only defire your excellency to confider. what confequences fuch cruelties may have, if a ftop be not put to them. I have the honour to be, &c.

his dead; the number of prifoners of rank that were taken; all concur, in fufficiently speaking who was victor in this bloody engagement. Among the prifoners of rank, were the generals de Soltikoff, de Chermicheaux, Manteuffel, Tieremhausen, Chievres, &c.

In the mean time, marshal Daun, to put his defign in execution of doing his utmost to drive prince Henry from his advantageous post at Dippolds and encamped his army at Stolpen, to the eastward of the Elbe; he chose this position to cut off all communication between Bautzen and Drefden; it also favoured

" The Konigfberg gazette denies the cruelties with which the ruffians are charged, and pretends to juffify those which are too notorious not to be acknowledged, by faying, that the pruffians themselves have fet fire to the villages to cover their march. But a reason of war ought to be diffinguished from an unnecessary cruelty. The former obliged the pruffians to burn the fingle village of Schaumbourg ; but what colour can the ruffians give to their burning the villages of Zorndorff, Zicher, Wilkerfdorff, Blumberg, Kutzdorff, Quartschen and Birckenbusch, all which were in flames at the fame time, and of which, the greatest part of the inhabitants were fome killed, and others thrown into the flames. The public hath already been informed, of the cruelties committed last june, by general Demikow, in Pomerania, and the New Marche. Above an hundred towns or villages were pillaged, and many women carried off and ravished. The ruffians also fet fire to the village of Furftgnau, and killed the farmer's wife : Vorbruch, and the fuburbs of Driesen, were likewise reduced to ashes. In the beginning of july, they pillaged the town of Friedeburgh, burnt the mill of Altenflies, and wounded the gardener of the bailiwic of Driefen. On the approach of the pruffians, they turned the environs of Cuftrin into a defert, burnt the feven villages abovementioned, killed the farmer of Tamfel, and at Blumberg and Camin maffacred many peafants, and even infants with their mothers, whofe mutilated bodies were found in the houfes and barns. The churches have not been spared; they opened even graves and vaults, to strip the dead; which they did particularly at Camin and Birckholtz, where they firipped the bodies of general Schlaberndorf, and general Ruitz, who were buried there. It will not be thought firange, that the name of barbarians should be given to perfons capable of fuch cruelties."

the operations of the army under general Laudohn on the confines of Brandenburgh; and of generals Harsch and de Ville, in the southern parts of Silesia; as he drew the attention of the prussian forces to the northern parts of that duchy.

To defeat all these excellent schemes, his prussian majesty had no sooner fought the battle of Zorndorf, than he began a rapid march to fuccour prince Henry : never did general make fuch long and flying marches in fo fmall a space of time; the king moved with fo much celerity, that he reached Groffen-hayn on the 9th of feptember, and Drefden the 11th. As his majefty advanced, the auftrians withdrew from the frontiers of Brandenburgh, and even of Lufatia; and general Laudohn, who had employed himfelf in pillaging the circle of Cotbus, with the utmost licentioufnefs, precipitately abandoned all the lower Lufatia, and even the fortress of Peitz. Marshal Daun himfelf retired from the neighbourhood of Drefden, and fell back as far as Littau. Indeed the duke of Deux Ponts, who commanded the army of the empire, poffeffed the ftrong poft of Pirna, and kept his ground; on the 5th of feptember, the ftrong fortrefs of Sonnenstein surrendered to him most unaccountably, after a cannonade of only one day; but this army undertook nothing further against the king.

As foon as that monarch was abfent, with the greateft part of his army, the ruffian general made a halt at Lanfberg, where he entrenched his army; in an inacceffible camp. Count Dohna commanded the pruffian troops, which the king left to act againft the ruffians; his head quarters were fixed at Blumberg, two leagues beyond Cuftrin. But on the 21ft of feptember, general Fermor quitted this advantageous camp, and marching by Soldin and Peritz, arrived on the 26th at Stargard in Pomerania, leaving wherever it paffed, the ufual and difmal marks of its prefence. Dohna followed them directly; he advanced vanced by Necidamin, and arrived the 29th at Soldin. General Fermor left a garrifon in Landfberg, but it evacuated the town on the approach of a detachment from the pruffian army.

The fwedes no fooner found that the king of Pruffia was marching to defend Saxony against the austrians, and the army of the empire, than they thought it a proper opportunity to push the war with vigor. They began to advance very briskly, into the pruffian territories. Count Hamilton who commanded their army, took up his head quarters at Fehrbellin, fo that fome of their advanced parties came within 25 miles of Berlin. But the king, being informed of their motions, immediately detached general Wedel, with a body of troops from Drefden, which, when augmented by fome troops that joined him on the road, amounted to 11,000 men; he arrived at Berlin the 20th of feptember, and in two days left at Berlin the 20th of leptember, and in two days left that city, to march againft the enemy. Upon the approach of these troops, the swedish army retreated; without defending any place; they left in Fehrbellin, a garrison of 1400 men, who were driven out after fome resistance, the 28th. The prince of Bevern (who had been exchanged for an austrian general taken by his prussion majesty) governor of Stetin, defended that town against them; and general Wedel continued to advance against them continued to advance against them.

The pruffian monarch himfelf, in the mean time, was profecuting the war, in perfon, with his ufual activity. Marshal Daun continued in his camp at Stolpen, from whence he had a communication with the army of the empire; the great defign of this general, was to prevent the king from fuccouring Silefia, where the austrian generals were making great progrefs, and had formed the fiege of Neifs. The king marched his army from the neighbourhood of Drefden, to Bautzen, a post equally advantageous for preferving a communication with prince prince Henry's army, for covering Brandenburg, and for throwing fuccours into Silefia. Marfhal Daun moved to the right, and encamped among the mountains of Wilten; and foon after occupied the camp of Ritlitz. The king's army marched to Hochkirchen, from whence he diflodged the auftrians, and pofted himfelf upon the eminences, which lie between Hochkirchen and Gorlitz. And during all these different motions, the two armies kept the most watchful eye on each other. It was by this time found, that nothing but a decifive engagement would answer marfhal Daun's projects; he foon perceived, that if the king kept posseful of his prefent advantageous situation, he should be obliged to retreat into Bohemia.

The neceffity of a battle was fo urgent, that Daun refolved to attack his pruffian majefty. He communicated his defign to the prince Deux Ponts, and having fettled meafures with him, marched in the dead of a very dark night, in three columns, towards the right of the king of Pruffia's camp. Nothing could be better contrived than this enterprize, of marfhal Daun; and it was executed with equal vigor and prudence. So wifely, that, notwithftanding the great numbers of the auftrians, the badnefs of the roads, thro' which they marched; and the darknefs of the night; yet the three columns at the fame time arrived at the pruffian camp, without being difcovered, and without confufion.

At five o'clock in the morning, of october the 4th, they began the attack, with the utmost ardour and resolution. The prussion had not time to strike their tents, before the enemy was in the midst of their camp, and had began a furious attack. The furprised troops ran half naked to their arms; and in the beginning of the engagement, marshal Keith was killed by two musset balls; and prince Francis of Brunswick had his head shot off by a cannon ball, as he

he was mounting his horfe. The lofs of two fuch able officers was irreparable to the king of Pruffia, who now had every thing on his own hands, at the moment when he most wanted affistance. But even in the dreadful confusion which must unavoidably have enfued in his army on fuch an occasion, his great prefence of mind, his activity, and valour, annimated his troops. Every where prefent, and in the hotteft of the fire, he, in fome measure remedied the unfortunate blow he was likely to receive. Finding himfelf very hard preffed, he ordered a large detachment from his left to reinforce his right wing; but at that inftant, general Retzow, who commanded the left, was himfelf vigoroufly attacked by the auftrians : fo that little or no affiftance could be afforded to the king, who was obliged to bear the brunt with his right alone, of the grand attack of the auftrians where mashal Daun himself was prefent.

That general had entrusted the attack of the village of Hochkerchen, and its eminences, to general Laudohn, who attacked them with he greatest fury. As it was a post of fuch importance, that the fate of the day depended on it; the difpute was hotteft there. Laudohn lucceeded; but he, no fooner was in poffeffion of it, than he was attacked with the utmost fury by the pruffians; he repulfed them; a fecond attack was made with equal bravery; and a third, but both were alfo unfuccefsful; the fourth attack, after a most bloody dispute they carried it; but marfhal Daun determined to make every poffible effort, by continually pouring fresh troops on that post, drove the pruffians out of it, after reiterated attacks, and a prodigious flaughter. His majefty then defpairing of the victory, ordered a retreat, which, to the aftonishment of all, who knew not the excellency of the pruffian discipline, was performed in good order, under the cover of a great fire of artillery placed, in the center of his camp. They loft about 7000 men men in this bloody battle, killed, wounded and pri-foners. The auftrians, by their own confession, 5000; who took a great number of cannon, fome colours, and a large quantity of baggage. It was very juftly a matter of wonder, that his pruf-fian majefty, who had fuch a number of excellent generals under him, fhould be furprifed in fuch a fatal manner; and that his out guards should not have discovered the enemy time enough to have prevented the dismal confequences that followed. As fatal as the first part of the day proved, it ought in the eye of the world, to be retrieved from dishonour, by the excellent retreat, which the pruffian army made. Hiftory, I believe, can produce but few instances of an inferior army being furprifed in their fleep; running half naked to their arms; recovering their order; fighting defperately for five hours; and at last making fuch an orderly retreat, without their enemies daring to purfue them. Nor did the greatness of the king's generalship ever appear more conspicuous; and he never found such great want of it as in this action; to have a wing of his army at a distance from his own quarters, attacked; the two commanders of it flain, in the first onset; the principal generals of it wounded; and the whole wing on the point of flight: to come himfelf in this critical moment, from the other wing, to reftore his confused troops to order; twice to repulse the enemy; four times to attack them; and at last to make fo orderly a retreat, overborn only by numbers and fatigue : thefe, I fay, are actions which difcover fuch a greatness of genius, fuch an admirable presence of mind; as was hardly ever equalled by any general. His pruffian majefty, after the action, fell back with his right wing to Weiffenbourg; his left ftill continued at Bautzen; and the head quarters were at Doberschutz. He had been in this polition but Y a fhore

a fhort time, before he perceived, that marshal Daun's view, was to prevent his marching into Silefia; and that, that general had laid aside his designs on Saxony; this determined him to fend for a large detachment from prince Henry's army; (which the prince brought up himself) and to march into Silefia, to raise the siege of Neiss, which the generals Harsch and de Ville were prosecuting with the utmost vigor.

His majefty found many difficulties in putting this scheme in execution. Marshal Daun lay with a fuperior army just in his road, whose only business was to obstruct his march. Saxony, would be left uncovered, and prince Henry, whose army was reduced by the late detachments, could make but ineffectual efforts against the united arms of the austrians and imperialists, if marshal Daun should turn his arms that way. On the contrary, if the king was to remain in his prefent fituation, and neglect to refcue Silefia, that province would be greatly over-run by the auftrians, whereby his affairs would fuffer equally, with uncovering Saxony. It is for great genius's only not to be difconcerted by fuch dilemma's as thefe; inftead of rendering him inactive, the king of Pruffia's ferved only to quicken the fpeed of his refolution, and the vigor with which he executed it. He determined to march into Silefia.

On the 24th of october, he broke up his camp, at Doberfchutz; and fetching a great compafs, arrived on the 26th in the plain of Gorlitz: marshal Daun had endeavoured to feize this post before the king; but could get no further than Landscron; their granadiers and carabineers, drew up opposite to the prussion van-guard, but were defeated with the loss of 800 men. By this admirable march, Daun at once loss all the advantages which he had before gained, from the victory at Hochkirchen, and from his advantageous vantageous posts; an open road lay before the king into Silefia, and all he could now do was to harras his rear. His majefty purfued his march with the greatest rapidity; general Laudohn, with 24,000 men followed him with little fuccefs.

On the 28th, his majesty marched to Lauban; and in two days after entered Silesia. The 6th of november he arrived at Noffen. The fiege of Neifs was carrying on with the utmost vigor ; and defended with the greateft bravery ; it commenced the 4th of august, and was completely invested the 3d of october. The pruffian army arrived in fight of Neifs the 7th of november, general Harsh having raifed the fiege, and repassed the Neifs, leaving a confiderable quantity of ammunition and ftores behind him; general Trefkow, the brave governor, fallied out upon them, and cut in pieces a body of 7 or 800 pandours. The king's prefence every where relieved the whole province; a large body of auftrians, who had been fome time employed in the blockade of Cofel, raifed it on the 9th; the auftrian general fell back on the army of general Harsch, and the united corps retreated into Bohemia and auftrian Silefia, with great precipitation. Never did any general plan his fchemes and exe-cute them with greater resolution, vigor, and celerity, than his pruffian majefty; this rapid march from Saxony, by which he entirely drove the auftrians out of Silefia, is a remarkable inftance; the pruffian foldiers, with reafon, expected that this would be their laft operation for that campaign ; but their fovereign was of a different opinion; Saxony was in darger, and it must be refcued.

Marshal Daun, soon after he had gained the advantage at Hochkirchen, determined that his greateft efforts during the remainder of the campaign, should be on the fide of Silefia; and confequently his first point was, to prevent the king from marching into it : but as his majefty had entirely defeated his whole Y 2 project, by this rapid, march, he thought it proper to change his plan of operations, and take advantage of the king's absence to fall on Saxony. His defign was to make himfelf mafter of the three cities of Drefden, Leipfick, and Torgau : for this purpose he followed the king no further than Gorlitz; and when he had detached general Laudohn to harrafs his rear, he marched himfelf with all expedition towards Drefden, having paffed the Elbe at Pirna, the 6th of november. Prince Henry's army, weakened confiderably, by the large detachments which he had carried to the grand army, after the battle of Hochkirchen, was obliged to retire from its advantageous post before Dreiden, to the westward of that city; Daun endeavoured to cut off his communication with it; but the prince threw himfelf into Drefden, and retired on the other fide the Elbe. The duke of Deux Ponts then marched, and invefted Leipfick; whilft marshal Daun did the fame to Drefden, with 60,000 men. That city was but meanly fortified, of very great extent, and defended only by 12,000 men, which was a very poor garrifon for fo large a place, commanded by the count de Schmettau. The auftrian general appeared in fight of the city, the 6th of november; by a motion on the 7th, the governor was convinced that his defign was against the capital.

project,

The fuburbs of Drefden were fo extremely weak, that Schmettau found it would be impoffible for him to prevent the enemy's poffeffing himfelf of them by a coup de main. An enterprize of this nature, would have been the more eafy, as most of the houfes of the fuburbs, from the gate of Pirna to that of Wilfdruff, abfolutely commanded the body of the town, both by their prodigious height, being fix or feven ftories high, and by their proximity to the ramparts. This laid count Schmettau under the difagreeable neceffity of burning them, for that end he filled the higheft houfes with combuffibles, and alfo those next to the ramparts, that his orders might be the more fpeedily fpeedily executed, whenever the reafons of war obliged him to iffue them in his own defence : the governor made a declaration to this effect, to M. de Bofe, chief cup bearer to the court of Drefden, adding, that as foon as the enemy should make a show of attacking the city, he should be obliged to fet fire to the suburbs.

The fuburbs of Drefden compose one of the finest cities in Europe, much fuperior to the part within the walls; where the most confiderable of the inhabitants refide, and is also the feat of those curious manufactures, for which that city is fo famous. Marshal Daun well knowing the neceffity the governor would find himfelf under, endeavoured to intimidate him from this measure, by threatening to make him perfonally answerable for the steps he should take. Schmettau, with all the firmnels of the bravest foldier, replied, that he would anfwer whatfoever he fhould do, and would not only burn the fuburbs, in cafe marshal Daun advanced, but would likewife defend the city itself ftreet by ftreet, and at laft even the caftle, which was the royal refidence, if he fhould be driven to it. The magistrates of the city no sooner were acquainted with this refolution, but they fell at the feet of count Schmettau, imploring him to change his mind; the part of the royal family that remained in Drefden, joined in thefe fupplications, praying him to fpare that last refuge of distressed royalty, and at least to allow a fecure refidence to those who had been deprived of every thing elfe. But the governor continued firm in his refolution; he answered, that their fafety depended on marshal Daun, that if he attacked them, the neceffity of war would oblige him to act quite contrary to the lenity of his disposition.

Schmettau had thrown up fome fmall redoubts to cover the fuburbs; these the austrians foon forced, and penetrated a good way into them; during which attack, their artillery played into the town. General Meyer, who was posted in the fuburbs, gave notice to

Y 2 to the governor the next day, that the auftrians were erecting batteries, and making other preparations to attack the city. Whereupon, it was abfolutely neceffary no longer to delay deftroying the fuburbs.

At three o'clock in the morning, of the 10th of november, general Meyer gave the fignal, and, immediately, a place, fo lately the feat of pleafure, arts, and trade, was all in flames. Dreadful as this conflagration was, yet the good order of the prufian troops, and the care of the governor, prevented it from being more flocking than was neceffary; very few loft their lives. General Meyer retired into the city; and the gates were directly barricaded *.

The Saxon and auftrian minifters + made the most aggravated complaints all Europe over, of the barbarities

* Vide Schmettau's memorial concerning the burning the fuburbs of Drefden.

+ Vide M. Ponickau the Saxon refident's memorial to the diet of the empire.

" By the violence of the flames, which was kept up by red hot balls, fired into the houfes and along the freets, the whole was inftantly on fire."-" A fhoe-maker, who was running away with his infant on a pillow, to fave it from being burnt to death, was met by a volunteer, who fnatched the pillow away from him, and threw the babe into the flames."-" One man had got his things into a waggon ; the pruffians ftopt it, covered it over with pitch, and fet it on fire."-" By this means a multitude of people of all ages, who inhabited those populous fuburbs, perished amidst the flames. The number of those who were killed in the fingle inn, called the Golden Hart, amounted to 90."-" The auftrian army beheld thefe horrible acts, filled with indignation and rage. Its generals melting with compafion, tried every method to remedy them. They fent 300 carpenters into the fuburbs, to endeavour to extinguish the flames." All these falsities are abundantly confuted in the following authentic papers.

Letter from M. de Bofe, chief cup-bearer to the court of Dresden, to count Schmettau.

I have the honour to acquaint your excellency, in answer to what you wrote me this day, I must own, that ever fince you had the government of Dresden, I informed you of all that his royal high-

nefs

barities exercifed by the pruffians in this affair. Never were there fuch infamous falsities trumped up, as thev nefs charged me to tell you in his name, and I have likewife re-. ported to his highnefs, your excellency's answers.

As to the first point, I also remember very well, that your excellency charged me, in the month of july, to reprefent to his royal highnels, that if marshal Daun should attack the city, you must fet fire to the suburbs, particularly the houses that adjoined to the ditch ; into which houses, your excellency immediately ordered combuftibles to be put. I alfo remember, that upon the follicitations, which his royal highnefs made, by me, to your excellency, you ordered them to be removed when marshal Dayn retired; and of this I alfo made an humble report.

It is also true, that when marshal Daun was at Lockowitz, on the 18th of november laft, your excellency charged me to acquaint his royal highnefs, in your name, that, if marshal Daun should approach near the town, and attack it, you should be obliged to burn the fuburbs, and the houfes adjoining the town ditch. Although I made feveral remonstrances to your excellency from the court, you declared, that you was ordered by the king your mafter, to defend yourfelf to the last extremity, and that you could not change your measures, unless marshal Daun should be prevailed with not to attack the town. To which I answered, in his royal highnefs's name, that he knew nothing of marshal Daun's defigns ; . that he could not intermeddle in the operations of war, and would confequently be obliged to endure what he could not hinder.

Laftly, it is well known, that your excellency, during the fire, took every poffible measure in the town, to prevent these excesses and diforders, which might have been apprehended; and his royal highnefs charged me to return you his thanks for it. I have the honour to be, &c.

Dec. 4, 1758.

JOACHIM FREDERICK de Bose.

Certificate of the magistrates of Dresden.

In confequence of orders received from his excellency count Schmettau, lieutenant general and governor, we certify what we know concerning the burning of the fuburbs. Two perfons were burnt to death, two killed, three hurt, by the fire, and two wounded by the foldiers.

We never heard, in any fliape, of a waggon full. of goods. which they were endeavouring to fave, and which it was pretended was covered with combustibles, and fc fet on fire; nor of ninety perfons faid to have perifhed at the Hart, nor of the auftrian troops, who, they fpread about in their memorials. They made no fcruple to invent and alter facts in fuch a manner, as to move the greateft pity towards the fufferers, and equal indignation againft his prufian majefty. But all thefe vile falfities were fully removed, by the authentic certificates of the magiftrates, &c. of Drefden, who were perfectly acquainted with the tranfaction; and all the heap of inventions that had been palmed upon all Europe for truths, were inftantly overthrown.

who, it is pretended, affisted in extinguishing the flames. Dresden, dec 4, 1758.

(L. S.) The magistrates of Drefden.

Certificate of the judges of the fuburb of Drefden.

We the judges of the fuburb of Drefden, certify, and atteft, that at the time of the calamity that hath juft happened, things paffed in this manner. The combuftibles were replaced on the 7th of november; and the magiftrates ordered all the judges to attend them: accordingly, Simon Stelzner, judge; John Chriftian, alderman; John Michael Faber, and John Chriftian Kretfchmar, judges, attended, and were told, (being enjoined at the fame time, to acacquaint the other judges with it) to provide the houfes with water, to give notice to the landlords, and keep the pumps ready, and endeavour to affift one another; becaufe, if any misfortune fhould happen, the people of the town could not come to our affiftance, nor could we go to theirs: and of this, we informed all the burghers.

On the 8th and 9th the auftrian army approached the town; and on the 9th, the auftrian huffars forced their way to the fuburb of Pirna, and to Zinzendorf house.

On the 10th, at two in the morning, fire was fet to the quarters of Pirna, Ram; and Wilfdorf, which confumed 266 houfes in all.

There have been therefore in all, two perfons burnt, a man and a woman greatly advanced in years, and whom it was impossible to fave; two killed, and two wounded.

What has been faid of a waggon is falfe; and it is equally falfe that ninety perfons perifhed at the Hart; only four perfons in all having loft their lives, as we have just mentioned. Lastly, it is falfe, that the austrian carpenters assisted us in extinguishing the fire. We never faw one of them.

We certify, that all the above is strictly conformable to truth. Dec. 4, Signed by the ten judges 1758. of Dreiden.

Marshal

Marshal Daun now found that it was impossible to take Dreiden by a coup de main; and besides the king of Prussian was marching back from Silessia, with great speed to succour it, he continued the siege flowly for about a week; but as regular operations took up too much time, he raised it the 17th.

I before mentioned, that his plan was to attack Leipfick and Torgau at the fame time that he himfelf besieged Dresden. The duke of Deux Ponts commanded before Leipfick; and general Haddick, with 10,000 men before Torgau. No fooner had the king of Prussia notice of the scheme, which marshal Daun had formed, to possels himself of those cities, than he ordered count Dohna, who commanded against the ruffians, to march with 12,000 men, to the relief of Torgau; general Wedel, who, with a finall army observed the motions of the swedes, received the fame orders. The latter general threw himfelf into Torgau, before Haddick arrived there, and when he made his attack, he repulfed him with lofs; and count Dohna being come up foon after, the two ge-nerals having joined their forces, purfued the auftri-ans to Eulenburg. The enemy, terrified at the approach of the pruffian armies, alfo raifed the fiege of Leipfick.

In the mean time, his pruffian majefty was marching with the greateft fpeed from Silefia; fo, that by the 15th of november, he arrived at Lauban; and having afterwards joined his army to the corps under the generals Dohna and Wedel, he arrived triumphantly at Drefden, the 20th. The auftrian armies, commanded by marfhal Daun, and that of the empire, fell back on the king's near approach, into Bohemia, without attempting any thing further. The marfhal placed his troops into quarters of cantonment, in fuch fituations as to form an immenfe chain of troops all along the frontiers of Silefia, and Saxony; where the imperial army joined, and continued it through through Thuringia and Franconia, where it was united to the quarters of the prince de Soubize, extending weftward, along the courfe of the Main and Lahn, to meet those of marshal de Contades, which stretched to the Rhine, and continued the chain along it quite to the Maese, fo as to command the whole course of of the Rhine, on both fides, both upward and downward.

I left the ruffian army retreating after the battle of Zorndorf, to Stargard in Pomerania. General Fer-mer forefaw that he should be unable to keep his ground in that province during the winter, unlefs he could fecure fome fea port, by which means he might receive the neceffary reinforcements from Ruffia by fea. In purfuance to this plan, he refolved to attack the little town of Colberg on the Baltick; expecting it would be an eafy conquest, as it was but meanly fortified. On the 3d of october, 15,000 ruffians formed the fiege; but what with their incapacity in that part of the art of war, and the brave defence made by major Heydon, the governor, this little town, fo poorly fortified, and fo weakly garrifoned, held out against them 26 days, and then obliged them to raife the fiege, the 29th of october: and this without receiving any fuccours whatfoever from without. The ruffians, without enterprifing any thing elfe, retired in fo difgraceful a manner out of Pomerania, without having been able to mafter one place of ftrength, in either Brandenburg or Pomerania. But they deftroyed all the country as they paffed, with the most favage fierceness. Nor were the ruffians the only enemy which carried on an inglorious war againft . his pruffian majefty; the fwedes were driven back into their own territories, with great lofs; and feveral of their important posts taken, before they went into quarters of cantonment. About the time that the austrians retired into winter quarters, the french did the fame, without any moleftation from prince Ferdinand;

nand; his army was too weak for offenfive operations, and the feafon too far advanced: fo that the britifh troops were not employed in this campaign; but they loft their leader, the duke of Marlborough, who died of a fever at Munfter, the 20th of october, contracted by the fatigues of the campaign. The prince difpofed his troops in the moft advantageous manner, in the bifhoprics of Munfter, Paderborn, and Hildefheim, and in the landgraviate of Heffe.

Before I difmiss the affairs of his pruffian majefty, for this campaign, I must take notice of the change which that monarch made in his conduct, towards the unfortunate electorate of Saxony. When first he entered that country, at the beginning of the war, he declared, that he had no defign to make a conquest of it, but only to hold it as a deposit in his hands for the fecurity of his own dominions, until he could compel his enemies to agree to reafonable terms of peace; but upon his return to Drefden, after having forced marshal Daun once more to quit Saxony, he altered his refolution : he ordered his directory at war to fend a decree to the deputies of the effates of the electorate, which, at the fame time that it enjoined them to deliver a certain quantity of flower and for-age, fignified in express terms; " That though the king of Pruffia had hitherto treated the electorate of Saxony as a country he had taken under his fpecial protection; the face of affairs was now changed in fuch a manner, that his majesty would confider it for the future, only as a conquered country, out of which he had driven his enemies, by force of arms." This declaration was no fooner published, than the revenues of all the faxon ministers of consequence were fequeftered; and as the ruffians had feized in Pruffia, all the rents of the eftates in that country, belonging to pruffian officers, the fame was done by the king in Saxony, in regard to the eftates of faxon officers in the ruffian fervice. His majefty alfo ordered ordered feals to be put on the papers of 20 perfons of confequence belonging to the court of Drefden, who were, at the fame time enjoined to fet out for Warfaw, in 24 hours; in fhort, the administration of the government was thrown entirely into the hands of pruffians. It has been very juftly remarked on this; that as foon as the king of Pruffia had declared, that he confidered Saxony as a conquered country, the people had from that time a right to expect to be governed in fuch a manner as became a just prince; more especially when the conqueror's affairs are not in fuch a dangerous fituation, as to require a very ri-gorous behaviour. When we confider the use which this monarch made of his conquest ; we are no longer dazzled by the heroic qualities of his mind. He continued to exact the most severe contributions of the inhabitants; and in a manner very little becoming a lawful fovereign. He not only furrounded the exchange with foldiers, but confined the merchants to narrow lodgings, on ftraw beds, and by the extremity of their fufferings obliged them to draw bills on their foreign correspondents for very large sums. Dresden had been quite exhausted by former contributions, and had even fuffered military execution long before : fo that but little excufe can be made for thefe unjust and violent proceedings. What could be more unreasonable, more odious, or more cruel, than to retaliate on the unhappy faxons, fome part of the exceffes committed by the ruffians on his dominions. Such a proceeding is not confiftent with that greatness of foul which one would think should attend fuch vast abilities, as are possessed by his prussian majesty. But let us review his actions this campaign, we shall there see his brightest fide.

In the last campaign, he gained the most resplendent victories; but in this he formed and executed the most useful defigns. The retreating out of Moravia in the face of a superior army, in that masterly manner, in which it was executed; his rapid march to drive the ruffians from his dominions; his gaining the battle of Zorndorf, merely by his own prefence of mind; his marching from thence to relieve Saxony, when in the mean time, the auftrians over-run Silefia; defeated at Hochkirchen, and yet acting as if he had been victorious; marshal Daun's whole plan being to prevent his entering Silefia; he takes a great compass round all his forces, and marching unpurfued, in the fwifteft manner, raifes the fiege of Neifs, and clears all Silefia of his enemies; from one corner of his dominions, he flies to the other; Saxony is again in danger; above an hundred thousand of his enemies befieging three great cities in it; they no fooner invade, than he refolves to refcue; from the extremity of Silefia, he makes forced marches into Saxony, raifes the fieges of its capital, Leipfick and Torgau, drives the two armies of the auftrians and the empire entirely out of the electorate, and arrives triumphantly at Drefden; four armies, containing above two hundred and fifty thousand men, endeavour to overwhelm his dominions, they are defeated, and drove back with difgrace; his territories are cleared, and he keeps poffeffion of Saxony itfelf. In fhort, whether we confider the rapid and vigorous marches, the artful movements, and judicious choice of posts, in particular, or the great management, the deep laid fchemes, or the fludied and refined conduct in general; we must certainly allow this campaign to difplay on the part of that monarch, very great abilities, and generalfhip; greater than ever he had fhewn before.

The fingular fituation of England guarded it from those terrible ravages of war, which laid waste the rest of Europe, consequently we can find but little for the subject of a military history there. Several squadrons had been equipped, and failed in the winter, but their operations were too minute to be comprehended in the narrow plan of this work. In parliament liament, every thing went finoothly; the voice of the minifter was that of the nation; the houfe of commons had granted his majefty, for the war and other ufes, upwards of eleven millions fterling, in the courfe of the year *. Nothing could have enabled the kingdom to raife fuch immenfe fums, but the flourifhing and extensive commerce it enjoyed. This received a great addition by the fuccefs which commodore Keppel's fquadron met with on the coaft of Africa.¹

Mr. Keppel, having been fent out from England, with a finall fquadron of fhips, to attack Goree, came in fight of that place the 28th of December. The Dunkirk, the Naffau, the Torbay, and the Fougeaux anchored against feveral batteries, on the island of Goree, and at the fame time covered two bombketches by their fire. The action began with a fmart cannonade from the island on the fhips, as they bore down, which was not returned, till they came extremely near, and then began a most dreadful fire, which in a few hours filenced the french batteries; and made fuch a terrible havock among their garrifon, that M. de St. Jean furrendered the fortrefs and island, with his garrifon, prifoners of war; in it was found 110 pieces of cannon and mortars.

The island of Goree confifts of a low narrow piece of land, near cape Verd in Africa, Weft long. 17. 40. lat. 15, in the river Senegal, about half a mile long, but very narrow. Though it is in the torrid zone, yet it enjoys a cool and temperate air almost the year round; which is owing to the equality of the days and nights; and its being continually refreshed by alternate breezes from the land and sea. M. de St. Jean had embellished it with several fine buildings; and added fome fortifications to it.

The conquest of these set set on the coast of Africa, were of infinite importance to the british nation, and of near as much advantage to its commerce, as any of the numerous acquifitions we have made this war. France, by means of them, brought her fugar islands to that high pitch, which they arrived at before the war. The fugar trade, and that to the coaft of Africa, are fo blended together, that the former cannot fubfift without the latter, on account of the negroes brought from thence; the french, by means of their fettlements of Senegal and Goree, raifed the price of negroes upon the english, on many parts of the coaft, from 6 and 7 l. per head to 20 and 301. And, although this great rife in their price affected the english West-indian trade to very fensibly, yet their own suffered not the least by it, by reason of their extraordinary bounties, privileges and immunities, which the french government allows for the encouragement of their african commerce. The gum Senegal is another article of great confequence, which falls into the hands of the english, by this important conquest. The african gum is exceeding useful, in feveral french manufactures ; fuch as their filks, and other fabricks, which require a gloffy luftre to recommend them to foreign nations; and this gum is no lefs ufeful in feveral english manufactures. So advantageous is it, that Mr. Postlethwait * informs us, that we have a recent inftance of two merchants in the city of London, who gained above 10,000 l. by a loading of gum from Senegal, which they obtained in the year 1757, on this coaft; the first cost of which cargo, on the outset, did not amount to 1000 l. There are alfo feveral other very material articles of trade. which must be chiefly in the hands of the posses of these important settlements. Gold dust, ivory, &c. are very beneficial trades; but the vaft advantage of the negroe trade is unbounded; the whole Weftindies must depend greatly on those; for negroes, who poffess Senegal and Goree.

* Importance of the african expedition confidered, p. 4.

Never was any year more glorious to Great Britain than 1758. We have many times triumphed over France, perhaps with greater eclat; but never with fuch real advantage to the nation. Those conquests which promote our trade, and confequently our naval power, are the most beneficial to us. The possession of Louisburg threw into our hands the whole codfishery, by which France maintained yearly in time of peace, near 20,000 feamen, and the profits to that nation were calculated at upwards of a million sterling; fuch an article, I think, to englishmen, can want no heightening. It is justly agreed, that our navy depends in great measure on our north american commerce; had the french been able to put those deep laid fchemes in execution, (which I have before treated of more fully) and which depended in a great meafure, on the possession of the forts Frontenac and du Quefne; our colonies would have been in the utmost danger. The conquest of those forts broke the chain, with which they had confined us, within fuch very narrow bounds, and threw a great part of the furr trade into our hands. The conquest of Senegal and Goree, as I have just mentioned, deprived the french of those valuable branches of commerce, the negroes gum, gold duft, and ivory. The expedition to the coaft of France convinced all Europe that that kingdom was vulnerable, even at home ; and the mifchief it did to their trade was very confiderable. Laftly, if we add the advantages gained in the East-indies, by admiral Pocock, and the vaft fuccefs our fhipping met with, in deftroying the french commerce, by the capture of their merchant ships and men of war, we may juftly conclude, that there never was a year, wherein the forces of Britain were exerted in a more glorious or advantageous manner, than that of 1758.

To what can we attribute this vaft fuccefs, but to that union and harmony which fubfifted in our councils? Did ever any former miniftry in England carry on

on fuch an extensive war as the prefent, without having a ftrong opposition in parliament to ftruggle with at the fame time? The coalition of parties was the original caufe of our fuccefs; had one ministry been in power for a few months; and then another, whole maxims were entirely opposite to those of the former, in what a confused manner must the war have been carried on ? But the two parties united have triumphed over faction, perhaps more dangerous than the enemy; they have employed the forces of their country to the best advantage; the navy, that glory of Great Britain, has been exerted in the most formidable manner; and, what is unufual, we have at the fame time, been equally victorious at land. They fent a british army to Germany, and at the fame time another to to the coast of France, without in the least neglecting the marine. In short, Britain, this year found herself alike victorious in every quarter of the world.

Situation of the belligerent powers at the opening of the year 1759. State of the affairs of his pruffian majefty. Of the empress queen. Of the empress of Ruffia. Of the republic of Holland. Case of the dutch ships considered. Affairs in England. In France. Expedition to the West-indies, under Hopson and Moore. Unsuccessful attack on Martinico. Basse Terre in Guadaloupe destroyed. The forces land. Basse Terre taken. General Hopson dies. Grande Terre conquered. The island capitulates. Remarks on its importance.

HE events of the year 1758, convinced all the belligerent powers of Europe, that the fortune of the war was not to be obtained by any one victory, however confiderable; but would be won by thofe whofe refources enabled them to fuftain the horrors of it longer than their enemies. It was plain, at the conclusion of the laft year, that that general, whofe genius furnished him with the greatest refources, was most likely to prove, in the end, victorious. It was really aftonishing to fee fo many great victories gained by the prussian troops, without being able to procure a fafe peace; when many of them would in former times, have been fufficient to transfer the empire of the world from one faction to another.

Nor was it lefs furprifing, that the three campaigns, wherein the king of Pruffia had met with fuch great fuccefs, did not exhauft him more. Those fucceffes, great as they were, often times were dearly purchased; and befides these, he had met with some checks; part of his dominions had been posseffed by his enemies;

the kingdom of Pruffia was in the hands of the ruffians, part of his weftphalian territories in those of the french. Many of his greateft generals were dead ; and great part of those brave veterans, who had performed fuch unparralleled actions under him, at the beginning of the war were no more : add to this his coffers, which had been to long a filling were drained. But yet, for all this melancholy catalogue, his pruffian majefty was far from being exhaufted, at the close of the last campaign. Had that been his fituation, let me afk the intelligent reader, whether he would have been able to drive fuch formidable and numerous enemies out of his german dominions.. At that period, he entirely poffeffed the electorate of Brandenburg, Pomerania, Silefia, Magdeburg, and Halberstadt of his own dominions, Saxony, part of Mecklingburgh, and part of fwedish Pomerania of his enemy's; add to this, he ftill received a fubfidy of 670,000 l. fterling, from Great Britain; add alfo those great refources which he found in his own fuperior genius; and in the abilities of his brother Henry, feconded by a long lift of able generals, who still remained to command his armies. These advantages enabled him to finish the last campaign in fo glorious a manner, and to prepare with the ne-ceffary vigor for opening the approaching one.

The empress queen, during the course of the war, had met with much greater shocks than the king of Pruffia; and the war felt equally heavy on her: but the refources of her power, as they are more natural than those of her enemy, so they are the more visible to the reft of Europe. Her immense territories; many of them equally fruitful and populous, enabled her to recruit all her loss. It must be a very long war that would entirely exhaust the house of Austria; her dominions are of fuch an immenfe extent; the fubject fo used to supply free quarter and endure military licence; her subjects so numerous, so hardy, and 7. 2 make make fuch good foldiers; that it is not to be wondered at, that the empress queen was able to recruit her armies, on every shock they received: In fact, marshal Daun, very early in the new year found that he should be at the head of an army as formidable as ever.

The empress of Ruffia was drawn into the war by the envy which fhe always had to her formidable rival in the north, the king of Pruffia.' Never did any power enter into a war upon more unjust motives than the court of Petersburg! It was meer envy of the rifing greatness of the pruffian monarch. But as fhe had engaged, fhe refolved to perfevere. The expence of the war fell more heavy on her enemy and the republic of Poland, than it did on herfelf; and, as it was an opportunity of forming her troops to fervice, fhe refolved to continue in her prefent fystem. The british minister made the greatest efforts to detach her from her alliance; but all his endeavours were vain; the court of Petersburg, notwithstanding the bad fuccefs it had hitherto met with, conti-nued refolutely bent on the ruin of the king of Pruffia.

Holland, during the greateft part of the preceding year, had been filled with nothing but remonftrances, memorials, and complaints, concerning the capture of her merchant fhips by the englifh men of war and privateers. France, foon after their fhips were feized by the englifh, at the beginning of the war, finding that their trade would be entirely ruined; endeavoured to obviate that ftroke by her policy. She took off the tax of 50 fous per ton, which fhe always chufes to keep on foreign freightage: fhe opened even her american ports, and admitted other countries to that choice part of her commerce, which by her maritime regulations, fhe hath at other times fo ftrictly kept to herfelf. Neutral nations feized at once on the advantage, and opened to the enemy new channels for the conveyance of those riches, by which the war was to be nursed and protracted: Under the banner of friendship they thus ferved the cause of the adversary, whose wealth secured by that protection would have passed faste and unmolested through the english fleets. Britain resolved, that her naval power should not be rendered useles, and feized on the property of her enemy, which she found on board neutral ships *.

The dutch were moftly concerned in this contraband trade; and they made terrible clamours at the capture of their fhips. The merchants of the principal cities in Holland prefented feveral memorials to the ftates general for redrefs of their grievances, offering to arm themfelves and protect their trade. The ftates remonftrated to the court of Great Britain againft this proceeding, but they met with a very cold reception. In fact, their claim was founded neither on the law of nations, nor on that of nature.

Holland, whenever fhe was engaged in war, almoft conftantly purfued the fame conduct : fhe fometimes even prohibited the commerce of neutral nations, beyond all juftice and moderation. In the year ± 1599 , when the government of Spain firft prohibited the fubjects of the united provinces, from trading to the ports of that kingdom, a liberty, which had unaccountably been allowed them, from the commencement of their revolt to that period; the ftates general in revenge, publifhed a placart, forbidding the people of all nations to carry any kind of merchandife into Spain. It is declared in the 41ft article of the treaty of 1674, between Great Britain and Holland, and alfo in every other commercial treaty, "That all goods are contraband, which are carried to places blockaded or invested." To shew what opinion the dutch had of a naval blockade in 1630*, when they pretended to have blockaded up all the coaft of Flanders, and openly avowed, that they would take and condemn all neutral fhips, which had the most diftant appearance of being bound to the ports of that country. In 1689 +, they also declared publicly, to neutral nations, that they defigned to block up all the ports of France. Now a blockade may be confidered as complete by fea as land; and were not the french weftindian islands as completely blockaded, as it was poffible for the dutch to blockade the ports of France ? And much more; their diftress and famine, for want of a communication with their mother country, fully declare, that they were invested. But besides these feveral reasons, I could produce many others founded intirely on the letter of the treaties fublifting between Great Britain and Holland, to fhew that they have not the leaft right to carry the property of the enemy in their fhips; but the bounds of this work will not permit me to be more particular; I must refer the reader to a very ingenious work, which canvaffes the affair to the very bottom, entitled, " A discourse on " the conduct of Great Britain, in refpect to neutral " nations."

If we turn our eyes towards England, and compare the flate of that nation at this period, with the flate it was formerly in, during the war, we fhall find that the very maxims of government were changed; the conflitution wore a different face. That unprecedented union, which reigned in both houfes of parliament, enabled the ministry, who lived in the greatest harmony with one another, to concert those great plans of actions against the enemy, and by their penetration in the choice of commanders to ensure their fuccefs. France, during the year, had every day found the power of the english in America to exert itfelf more and more: it had been like an almost fmothered flame, which, when it broke through the fmoke that had covered it, blazed forth with renewed violence. Those shocks, so fatal to the trade of France, which fhe had received in America that year. had convinced her, that it would never be poffible to retrieve those loss, by her operations in that part of the world. Her great efforts must be made in Europe. Hanover was her aim on the continent, if she could keep possession of that electorate till a peace, she doubted not of being able to conclude an advantageous one. But to effect this, it required that their army in Germany should be recruited, and reinforced, that the fubfidies which had been paid to Sweden, Auftria, and Ruffia, fhould be regularly continued; that the king of Pruffia might gain no refpit. Nor was the plan which France determined to purfue, confined to Germany, she resolved to set about in real earnest, invading Great Britain; for this end, immenfe preparations were to made in feveral of the ports of that kingdom: by this means, the peace did not depend on a fingle ftake, they had two fchemes, and if ei-ther of them fucceeded, their defign would be entirely answered. But all these great points could not be put in execution, without great funds. It was the misfortune of the french nation at this time, to be governed by a weak and divided ministry, and a ravenous miftrefs, who fleeced the kingdom of im-menfe fums every year. The deftruction of their trade made money very fcarce, and the neceffities of the flate being urgent, they were obliged to adopt a new plan of raifing the revenue. Moreover Silhounate was made controller of the finances; and he immediately removed the farmers of the revenue from finding the fupplies; and new methods were devifed for for raising money; but the great want of it still appeared, these were only temporary expedients.

But as the face of affairs in England was fo much changed, fo thefe fchemes of her enemies no longer had that effect which used to attend them. At the fame time that an army was maintained in Germany, and fuch numerous forces were kept in action in America, the East and West indies, Britain, by the good con-duct of her government, was enabled to guard against any attempt that France might make to invade her. The militia act, fo well known, had armed feveral thousand men for the defence of the kingdom, the regular troops were augmenting both in number and fpecies; and for the first time we faw light horse and infantry. Our navy was more formidable than ever, and feveral fquadrons were generally blocking up the ports of France, and cruifing on their trade, whilft others were carrying destruction to the french colonies in every part of the world. In this fituation, Britain had little to fear at this period, from the defigns which that nation had formed to invade her.

One of the most confiderable expeditions that was undertaken by the english ministry, in the beginning of the new year against France, was that to the Westindies. About the latter end of october 1758, commodore Hughes, with a squadron of eight ships of the line, a frigate, and four bombs, with fixty tranffports, fet fail from Spithead, having on board the following regiments, the old buffs, Duroure's, Elliot's, Barrington's, Watson's, and Armiger's, with a detachment from the artillery at Woolwich; 800 marines were also distributed on board the men of war. The general officers employed were, major general Hopfon, commander in chief; major general Barrington; colonels Armiger, and Haldane; and lieutenant colonels Trapaud and Clavering, brigadiers. The 3d of january, 1759, they came to an anchor in Carlifle bay, in the ifland of Barbadoes. Commodore dore Moore, who was lying in that bay, with another fmall fquadron, took upon himfelf the command of the united fleet. Having watered at Barbadoes, they fet fail from thence january 13th, their armament not exceeding 5000 men complete *.

not exceeding 5000 men complete *. The grand object of this expedition was the ifland of Martinico, the first of the french fugar islands, the feat of the government, and the center of all the trade which France carries on with the West-indies : It is very strong both by nature and art. The shore on every fide indented with very deep bays; the many fands round the island which are to be seen only at low water, render an approach very dangerous without good pilots. It is very fruitful, well cultivated, and watered, abounding with plantations and villages along the sea coast. Port Royal is the principal place in the island, which is considerable for its fize, trade, and strength. St. Pierre is the second town which is of near as much consequence as Port Royal. The french had at this time a good number of regular forces here; besides a numerous and well armed militia, and not contemptible for their discipline.

The 15th of january, the troops were landed without opposition, on the west fide of Port Royal harbour, after the men of war had driven the french from their batteries and intrenchments; they had frequent skirmishes with the enemy, but these did not prove fo great an obftruction to the fuccels of the troops, as the nature of the country. A multitude of deep ftreams of water, inclosed by fteep and almost perpendicular precipices, proved a great obftacle to the march of the troops; the roads broken up, and they had five miles to march before they could get to Port Royal. General Hopfon, finding thefe difficulties unfurmountable, fent on board the Cambridge, to acquaint the commodore, that he found it impossible to maintain his ground, unless the squadron could give him affistance, by landing some heavy cannon, &c. at the favanna, near the town of Port Royal, or that the commodore would attack the citadel in the bay, at the fame time that he did it on the fhore. A council of war having judged this to be impracticable, the general gave orders for the troops to retire, and they were re-embarked on the 17th. One cannot help observing in the account of this transaction, which was published in the Gazette, and which I apprehend was extracted chiefly from the commodore's letters, that there did not feem to be fo perfect a harmony between the general and the commodore as is always neceffary in fuch expeditions as thefe, and on which their fuccefs entirely depends.

The next day the general acquainted the commodore, that the council of war was of opinion, it would be most for his majesty's fervice to go to fort St. Pierre with the troops, in order to make an attack upon that place, and that no time should be lost. It was hoped that more might be done there; and accordingly the fleet came in fight of that town the 19th; forty merchantmen were then lying in the bay, and the commodore ordered two bombs to fail in near enough to do the proper execution; he fent a man of war in to found, and ordered the Rippon to filence a battery a battery, about a mile and a half north of the town; and threw out a fignal for the transports to come under his ftern. All these dispositions seemed as if the attack was refolved on ; and in fact, the commodore had affured the general, that he could deftroy the town of St. Pierre, and put the troops in poffeffion of it; but as the fquadron might be confiderably damaged in the attack, and the whole armament unable after it to proceed on any other material fervice, he reprefented to the general, that it would be better to proceed to the town of Baffe Terre, in the ifland of Guadaloupe. The general concurring in this opinion, the bombs were forbid to play, the founding fhip recalled; and to the aftonishment of every body, the merchantmen were left without any attack being made on them; as it was the opinion of feveral officers, that they might have been, at least destroyed without damaging the ships, so much as to difenable them from proceeding on their fervice. But it looks as if the commodore had forgot he had ordered the Rippon to engage a battery; that ship proceeded down to her station, and in a few minutes filenced it; but before she could disengage herself, four batteries more were opened, to play on the fhip, which damaged her masts, fails, and rigging very much, and the captain observing the commodore above two leagues aftern of him, with the reft of the fleet, and no fhips but his own in the harbour, nor any coming to his affiftance, concluded that the attack was laid afide, and his own ship being in great danger, ordered his boats to be manned, and towed her off.

Purfuant to the refolution agreed on at the council of war, to attack Guadaloupe, the fquadron fet fail, and arrived off the town of Baffe Terre, the 23d of january; they found the place very formidably fortified towards the fea, as the enemy had raifed feveral batteries at all the convenient places along the fhore; and the citadel, was thought by colonel Cunningham, the the chief engineer, on account of its great height to be impregnable to the ships, but in this opinion he proved miftaken. The fame day the commodore ordered the attack to be made in the following difpo-fition : the St. George, Norfolk, and Cambridge to lay along fide the citadel, mounting 47 guns; the Lyon, a battery of nine guns; the Panther and Burford, a battery of 12 guns; the Berwick, a battery of feven guns; and the Rippon another of 6 guns. He ordered them to filence, if poffible, their refpec-tive batteries, and to lie by them till further orders; having fhifted his broad pendant from the Cambridge, and hoifted it on board the Woolwich of 40 guns. The fhips having all taken their flations, the cannonade began at nine o'clock, and continued with the most unremitting fury till night; as soon as the feveral batteries were filenced, the four bombs ftood in for the fhore, and threw shells and carcaffes into the town. The houfes and churches were every where foon in flames, the magazines of powder blown about the enemies ears, and the whole about ten o'clock blazed out in one general conflagration. It burned all night, and the following day; when it was almost totally reduced to afhes. The lofs was immenfe, from the number of warehoufes in the town, full of rum, and other rich, but combustible materials. It is furprifing that the fquadron fhould fuffer fo little as it did, in fuftaining fuch a terrible cannonade.

The 24th, the troops landed without oppofition, and took poffeffion of the town and citadel of Baffe Terre; the fire ftill continuing in the former. M. d'Eftreil, the governor, behaved very daftardly; inftead of exerting himfelf in the time of danger, vifiting the feveral engaged batteries, and by his prefence infpiring his people with redoubled ardor; he retired to a plantation out of gun-fhot, and remained an inactive fpectator of the deftruction of the day. Had he acted as became a brave man, fighting for his his honour and his country, he would the next morn-ing have taken precautions to prevent the landing of the troops, who had a difficult fhore to deal with, attended with a violent furff from the fea, and defended by entrenchments and lines every where thrown up. But this pretended fon of Mars, retired with his troops to a rifing ground, about fix miles from Baffe Terre, where he ftrongly intrenched himfelf, the fituation being very ftrong by nature. The afcent to it was very steep. The road from the camp of the english troops, interrupted by broken rocks; and the ground interfected by a variety of gullies, very difficult to pass; all which rendered an attack on it very hazardous. While the governor remained in this fituation, general Hopfon and commodore Moore fent him an offer of terms; but he returned them a very gallant anfwer, which would have done him honour, had it fucceeded as gallant behaviour.

The latter end of the month was employed in fcouring the country; and as the enemy in fmall parties were continually laying ambufcades among the fugar canes; orders were given to fet them on fire, which was very foon executed. And commodore Moore confidered, that the eaftern part of the ifland, called Grand Terre, which is the moft fertile of the whole, might be attacked with advantage, if the fort Louis was taken; refolved to detach fome men of war from the fquadron for that purpole; accordingly the Berwick, with three frigates, three tenders, and two bombs, failed the 6th of february, and the 13th attacked the fort and the batteries near it; when, after a fevere cannonade, which lafted fix hours, a large detachment of marines, and the highlanders, landed, who drove the enemy from their intrenchments, and hoifted the englifh colours at the fort.

General Hopfon died at the camp near Basse Terre the 27th, and the command of the army then devolved volved on major general Barrington, who on the 1ft of march, brought off all the troops, re-imbarking them on board the transports by the break of day, leaving colonel Defbrifay in the citadel, with Watfon's regiment, and a detachment from the artillery. It was the general's fcheme to make the attack on the fide of Grande Terre; accordingly the commodore with the fleet failed. It was the 11th before the fleet came to an anchor off fort Louis. It was here that Mr. Moore received intelligence, that Monf. Bompart, with a squadron of eight fail of the line, and three frigates, with a reinforcement of troops, was arrived at Port Royal in Martinico. The commodore directly perceived, that the french fquadron might be able to throw in fuccours into Grand Terre, if he attempted it, without his being able to prevent it, as the fquadron then lay; he took a refolution to fail immediately to prince Rupert's bay, in Dominica, as he should there have it more in his power to protect Guadaloupe. The privateers of the french took advantage of this movement; and above eleven weeks, while the two fqudrons were watching one another in the two bays; they failed out, and took above 90 fail of english merchantmen, and carried them into Martinico. These captures occafioned heavy complaints from the british islands, for they faid, (and I believe, with a good deal of reafon) it was equally practicable for the english fquadron to have anchored at Port Royal, as at prince Rupert's bay; by which, two ends might have been answered, the french men of war could not have got out, nor the privateer prizes have got in, and of course the latter must have been re-taken ; no other harbour being then open to them except St. Pierre's or Granada, either of which, was at that time to be blockaded by a fingle frigate *. made his appearance off Port Royal, M. du Bompart must have been reduced to the alternative of fighting a fuperior force, or of retiring behind the citadel into the carenage to avoid it.

General Barrington took all the precaution in his power to ftrengthen the fort at St. Louis; and, finding that the war in the ifland, was not to be profecuted with all the troops in a body; he detached colonel Crump, with 600 men, in fome of the transports, to endeavour to land between the towns of St. Anne, and St. François; colonel Crump executed this with the greateft bravery, deftroying the batteries of cannon which the enemies had raifed there. And as the general expected, that the enemy would weaken a ftrong poft they had at Gofier, to reinforce St. Anne's and St. François, he went with another detachment and made himfelf mafter of it.

In the mean time, colonel Defbrifay*, who was left governor of the citadel of Baffe Terre, loft his life by an unfortunate accident. A cannon being fired too near a powder magazine, the return of the wadding blew it up, and with it the governor, major Trollop, a lieutenant, and feveral men. Major Mel-

* Lieutenant colonel Desbrifay, was captain of foot at the battle of Val, near Mastricht, in 1747; being wounded, and lying on the ground, a french officer, contrary to the rules of war, and every generous sentiment ran him through, which unmanly example was immediately followed by the party he commanded, all of them planting their bayonets in, his body. He received 15 wounds, and eight of them were judged mortal. He was afterwards in company with marshal Saxe, whose politeness in war was fo well known, and who preffed him ftrongly to declare, who the officer was, that had used him in fo base a manner, threatening to difgrace him, at the head of the regiment; but Defbrifay, though well acquainted with his name, the commission he bore, and the corps he ferved in, had fo much greatnefs of mind as to decline it; he contented himfelf with letting his excellency know, that he was not a stranger to his perfon, but begged he would excufe him, from being obliged to point him out.

The most confiderable force the enemy had, was collected on the mountain called Dos d'Afne. It is a post of great strength and importance, as it forms the only communication there is between the town of Basse Terre and the capes Terre, the pleasantest and most fruitful part of the island. It was not judged practicable to break into it this way; and all the reft of the Baffe Terre part of the island was in the ene-mies posses of the general therefore formed a plan to furprise the towns of Petit Bourge, St. Mary's, and Guogave; but the fuccefs of this project, though well concerted, was, through the darknefs of the night, the roughnefs of the weather, and the ignorance and fear of the negroes, who were guides, entirely frustrated. This obliged general Barrington to attempt that by force, which could not be effected upon a fafer plan; but as he was then laid up with a fevere fit of the gout, he fent brigadier Clavering and Crump to reconnoitre the coast near Arnoville, and upon their report, fent them with 1400 men to land there, which they effected the 12th of april. The enemy made no opposition to Mr. Clavering's landing, but as his troops advanced, retired to very ftrong intrenchments behind the river le Corne. This post was to them of the utmost importance, as it covered the whole country to the bay Mahaut, where their provisions and supplies of all forts were landed from St. Euftatia, and therefore they had very early taken poffeffion of it, and had fpared no pains to strengthen it, though the situation was such, as required very little affiftance from art. The river was only acceffible at two narrow passes, on account of a a very deep morafs; and thofe places they had occupied with a redoubt, and well pallifadoed intrenchments, defended with cannon, and all the militia of that part of the country. The englifh could only approach them in a very narrow contracted front, no wider than the roads through which they marched; and thefe were defended with deep and broad ditches. The artillery, confifting of fix pieces of cannon, kept a conftant fire on their intrenchments, to cover the attack made by Duroure's regiment, and the highlanders, who behaved with the greateft coolnefs and refolution, keeping up, as they advanced, a regular platoon firing. This behaviour fo intimidated the enemy, that they abandoned the firft intrenchment on the left. Into which the highlanders threw themfelves, with part of Duroure's regiment, fword in hand, and purfued the enemy into the redoubt. The french ftill kept their ground in their intrenchments on the right, but on being attacked they fled, and 70 of them were made prifoners.

As foon as the ditches were filled up for the paffage of the artillery, Mr. Clavering marched towards Petit Bourg; in his way, he was to crofs the river Lizard; behind which, at the only ford, the enemy had thrown up very ftrong intrenchments, protected by four pieces of cannon, on a hill behind them. The brigadier having reconnoitred the river, found it would coft him very dear to force a passage at the ford. He therefore kept up the attention of the enemy, by firing all night in their lines; during which time, he got a couple of canoes conveyed about a mile and an half down the river, where, being launched, a fufficient number of men were ferried over, to attack them in flank, while the remainder did the fame in front; but the enemy foon perceived their danger, and left the intrenchments with the greatest precipitation.

When the brigadier arrived at Petit Bourg, he found it fortified with lines, and a redoubt filled with cannon; but the enemy abandoned it and the port to the conquerors. On the 15th, brigadier Crump was detached with 700 men to the bay Mahaut; he found the batteries and the town abandoned. These he burnt, with an immenfe quantity of provisions that had been landed there by the dutch, and reduced the whole country as far as Petit Bourg. The fame day, Mr. Clavering detached capt. Steel with 100 men to Guogave, to deftroy a battery there: the panic of the enemy was fuch, that they only difcharged their cannon at him, and deferted a post that might have been maintained against an army. He nailed up feven pieces of cannon, and returned the fame evening.

In the mean time, the french were drawing all their force to St. Mary's, to oppole the english, and had thrown up intrenchments to ftrengthen the poft. The brigadier immediately formed a defign to get into their rear, by roads which the enemy thought impracticable; but they, perceiving his defign, made a movement to oppose him, which made him refolve, without further delay, to attack them directly in front, and it was accordingly executed with the greatest vivacity, notwithstanding the constant firing, both of their cannon and musketry. They abandoned all their artillery, and fled in fuch confusion, that they never afterwards appeared before the brigadier. He took up his quarters at St. Mary's, and the next day entered Grande Terre, which is the richeft and most beautiful part of this, or any island in the West-Indies. No lefs than 870 negroes, belonging to one man only, furrendered that day.

The governor of the ifland, finding himfelf fo very close prefied on all fides, fent a flag of truce to general Barrington, to demand a ceffation of arms, and to know what terms he would grant. On the first of may the capitulation was figned; their possessions, and their civil and religious liberties were granted them.*

The capitulation was hardly figned, when the french fquadron, under monf. Bompart, appeared before the island, and landed at St. Anne's, in the Grande Terre;

* Extract from the capitulation, between the governor and the english general.

11. The garrifon shall be fent to Martinico.

VI. All the officers who have effates in the colony (except the governor, unlefs the king permits him) fhall be allowed to appoint attornies to act for them until the peace; and if the ifland is not then ceded, they fhail have leave to fell their effates, and carry off the produce.

Between the inhabitants, the english general, and commodore.

III. The inhabitants are allowed the free and public exercise of their religion; the pricits and religious shall be preferved in their parishes, convents, and all other possessions.

V. The inhabitants are allowed their civil government, their laws, cuftoms, and ordinances; juiltice to be administred by the fame perfons now in office; but when any vacancies happen, they are to be filled up by the fuperior council, and receive their commiffions from his britannic majefty. If the island is ceded to the king of Great-Britain, the inhabitants shall have their choice, either to keep their own political government, or to accept that which is established at Antigua, and St. Christopher's.

VII If the island is ceded to his britannic majefly at the perce, it is to be fubject to the fame duties and imposes, as the other english leeward islands the most favoured.

XI. No other but the inhabitants refiding in the island, shall posses any lands or houses before a peace; but it is ceded to the king of Great Britain, then the inhabitants shall be permitted, if they chuse it, to fell their possessions (but to none besides subjects of Great Britain) and retire where they please.

XXI The inhabitants and merchants of this ifland, included in the prefent capitulation; thall enjoy all the privileges of trade, and upon the fame conditions as are granted to his bitannic majely's fubjects, throughout the extent of his dominions; but without affecting the privileges of particular companies in England, or the laws of the kingdom, which prohibit the carrying on of trade in any other than english bottoms.

the general of the french Carribbes, with a reinforcement from Martinico of 600 regulars, 2000 buccaneers, and 2000 fland of fpare arms for the inhabitants, with artillery and mortars : had this fupport arrived an hour fooner, the conqueft of the ifland muft at leaft have been very difficult, if not impoffible. As foon as he heard that the capitulation was figned, he re-embarked again.

On the figning of the articles of capitulation, the inhabitants quitted the Dos d'Afne, and returned to their plantations and houfes; they began alfo to repair the ruins of Baffe Terre; where, foon after fhops were opened, and the produce of the country fold as ufual, unmolefted by the troops in camp or garrifon, general Barrington caufing the ftricteft difcipline to be obferved.

The conqueft of the fmall island of Marigalante, on the 26th, and those of Defeada, Santos, and Petitz Terre, completed the business of the expedition; they furrendered on the fame terms as Guadaloupe. So that now the french have no footing on the leeward islands, Thus was this valuable island reduced under subjection to the british crown, by the bravery of the land forces employed in the expedition. It was very odd to find how feverely our West-India trade suffered from the privateers of the enemy, while commodore Moore lay with a superior squadron in those feas. Monf. Bompart was generally very near the english squadron, and effectually protected the french trade.

Gaudaloupe lies in lat. 16° 6¹. long. 62°. and is about 90 leagues in compafs; divided into two parts by a channel, no where above 300 feet over; the one called Grande Terre, and the other Baffe Terre. Its chief produce is fugar, cotton, indigo, coffee, ginger, tobacco, caffia, bananas, pine apples, rice, maize, mandioca, and potatoes.- The air is very clear and wholefome, and not fo hot as in Martinico. Grande Terre is defititute of water, and not not thoroughly cultivated; but the cafe is the very reverfe in Baffe Terre, the water being as good there, as the foil is rich; it is very near as populous as Martinico. In fhort, there is nothing in this ifland wanting, for the convenience and delight of life, in an air more temporate and falubrious than is commonly breathed between the tropics.

As to the importance of this acquisition, I need only state a few particulars before the reader, and every intelligent perfon must allow it to be infinite. Guadaloup makes annually 40,000 hogheads of fugar, which is a larger quantity than any of our fugar islands produce, except Jamaica. Belides this, the articles of cotton, indigo, coffee, and ginger, are very confiderable; it also carries on a trade with the Caracca's, and other parts of the spanish main, which is a trade wholly in the manufactures of Europe, and the returns for which are made almost entirely in ready money. Without intimating the land, the houfes, the works, and the goods in the ifland, the flaves, at the lowest estimation, are worth upwards of 1,250,000 l. fterling. The fingle branch of their trade, the fugars, befides the employment of fo much fhipping, and fo many feamen, will produce clear 300,000 l. per ann, to the merchants of that nation who posseffes it, Coffee, a very inconfiderable object in the british colonies, is here a very great one. They raife alfo great quantities of indigo and cotton, which supply materials for the beft and most valuable manufactures. Another article, which makes the poffeffion of this island fo very defireable, is the conveniency of its fituation, if in the hands of the french, for being a harbour for their privateers in this part of the world, as it is in the very middle of the english Leeward-islands; which made it the Dunkirk of the West-Indies.*

* Vide remarks on a letter addreffed to two great men, p. 42.

I think

I think, these points confidered, every one must allow, that the conquest of guadaloupe was of infinite importance to this nation; and was a particular instance, how active and enterprising a ministry, at this time, guided the affairs of England, who, although they made such great efforts in every other part of the world against the enemy, still forgot not this, but attacked them here with equal wisdom and success.
